Mr. REED. They are moral thus far. The President spoke of some change that would refer these questions to a tribunal to be decided, and said that when that was done they would then be legal, because there would be a court to decide them. I understood him to say that, but I was not sure that I did so understand him.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not have any recollection of that.

Mr. REED. How does the Senator propose to raise these questions from a moral obligation to a legal one?

Mr. PITTMAN. There are certain matters that may be determined by the unanimous vote of the council, by which nation members of the league agree to be bound. For instance, one of the legal obligations is that if the council, in the case of a dispute, makes a unanimous recommendation and one of the nations accepts the recommendation, then the other will not go to war; that, in my opinion, may be differentiated from a moral obligation.

Mr. REED. Because there has been a deciding body.

Mr. PITTMAN. Because it is not left solely to the judgment and conscience of the individual, but is left in the judgment of a body created by a contract.

Mr. REED. Then the decision rendered by that body becomes binding, and hence the Senator says it then becomes a legal obligation——

Mr. PITTMAN. It may become binding.

Mr. REED. Whereas before it was a moral obligation.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; it may become binding or it may not become binding, but——

Mr. REED. If it is a matter that is left for decision.

Mr. PITTMAN. As far as the obligation is concerned, it is a legal obligation.

Mr. REED. Exactly. Now——

Mr. PITTMAN. I am not saying whether a legal obligation becomes binding or not binding. That may be one of the elements in drawing a distinction between a moral and a legal obligation. But the distinction, again have in mind, is where a person agrees to a specific thing and agrees that that specific thing may be determined by a court or a particular body. Then its individual judgment in the matter is disposed of, and it has granted to a body other than itself some authority and power of determination and enforcement of the decree under the determination. However, in a case where a government simply volunteers to do something under certain conditions and there is no body created to determine when the conditions arise, then it can not be determined except by the individual, and whenever there remains in the individual the right to determine when a cause of action has arisen against him, it is no more than a moral obligation.

Mr. REED. Getting that down to a few words—and I am greatly interested in this question and think it is quite important—it amounts to this: If the United States agrees by the signing of this document that in case one of the members of the league is externally attacked, we will defend it against external attack, the Senator is of the opinion that as that matter now stands it is a moral obligation, because the United States determines for itself whether there has been an external attack?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is one of the reasons. The other is that if it does determine that there has been an external aggression, it still has the further individual judgment, which may be unaffected by anyone else, of determining what method it will use in assisting in carrying out its obligatons.

Mr. REED. That, of course, may be necessary to the clarity of the Senator's view; but, substantially, we determine for ourselves the question of fact, Was the Empire of Great Britain externally attacked? There is no tribunal to determine that; and so we say that it has not been raised to the point of a legal obligation, but it is a question that rests upon our honor, and we call it a "moral obligation." Now, is the Senator proposing to change any of these obligations from moral to legal obligations? Has the Senator submitted any plan for that?

Mr. PITTMAN. The plan that I have submitted does not propose to change any moral obligation to a legal obligation, but it simply intends to satisfy those who may be uneasy with regard to that question—and, of course, there are able men who are uneasy with regard to it—that our construction will be continued in force by the league of nations.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator to say in the colloquy—and I may have misunderstood him; indeed, that was the real reason for my taking the floor—that he was in favor of deciding certain questions by unanimous vote of the league, leaving out the contesting parties, and that in those circumstances it was a legal obligation.

Mr. PITTMAN. The resolution provides in section 3 that all domestic and political questions affecting the internal affairs of one of the governments is exempt from the jurisdiction of the league of nations. That is a positive statement.

There is another positive statement in section 3, and that is that questions concerning the tariff, commerce, immigration, and other matters that are mentioned shall specifically be agreed to be domestic and political affairs.

There is then a third part to that section, which provides that if a disputant claims that any other question involves any domestic matter, then that matter shall not be considered unless there be a unanimous vote declaring it not to be a domestic question.

Mr. REED. As to that unanimous vote, does the Senator propose to have the contesting parties or disputants vote?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I do not.

Mr. REED. Then that would leave us in this shape: If a question involving the tariff or immigration or the other subjects the Senator has mentioned were to come up, we could say, "Those are clearly domestic, and you can not touch them."

But now a fifth question arises, which the United States contends is a domestic question and which our antagonist—we will say Japan—says is not a domestic question. Then that would go to decision by the council, and neither Japan nor the United States would sit. If there were a unanimous vote against us we would have a binding legal duty imposed upon us?

Mr. PITTMAN. We would.

Mr. REED. So that there we get the distinction between the moral obligation and what the Senator calls the "legal obligation"?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is the distinction.

Mr. REED. Now, what about the enforcement of that legal obligation? That would be enforced by the powers of the league?

Mr. PITTMAN. The enforcement of it, as I remember, is by a prevention of the country against whom a decision is made, when it is accepted by the other party, from going to war. That, as I recollect, is as far as the enforcement in the matter goes.

Mr. REED. But if they do not obey, is there not a provision for economic pressure?

Mr. PITTMAN. There is a provision for economic pressure as presently interpreted; but section 2 of the resolution I have introduced expressly provides that each Government may determine for itself whether or not it will even bring economic pressure to bear.

Mr. REED. Yes; but suppose the Government does conclude that it is going to bring economic pressure, and does it, then the league is back of that Government, provided there has been a unanimous decision of the council barring from the decision the disputants?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is my understanding of it now; yes, sir.

Mr. REED. Of course, economic pressure can amount to the blockading of ports, the seizing of commerce upon the high seas, and the barring of intercourse with the nationals of the power under condemnation. In short, it can be pressed to the point of starvation, can it not?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think that is undoubtedly true.

Mr. REED. The Senator does not really think that starving babies at home is any better than killing men on the field of battle, does he?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the league of nations as it is construed by the President—and he is convinced, so he says, that the other framers agree with him—is hardly more to-day than a meeting place where the concensus of opinion of the civilized world may be obtained and its moral force brought to bear.

Mr. REED. Is the Senator willing to write that sentence into the league—that their jurisdiction shall be so limited? If that should be written into the league we shall not have any trouble about it.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will write it into the league; I would write anything into the league that might please the Senator from Missouri if it does not destroy it.

Mr. REED. I think if there can be written into the league that it is nothing but a meeting place where the representatives of the nations of the earth meet for consultation, without the power of coercion or of compulsion, there will not be much difficulty.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is not what the Senator from Nevada says.

Mr. REED. He came very near saying it, if I understood him aright.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Senator had walked away at the time, he probably would have insisted that I said it.

Mr. REED. I will let the RECORD speak for itself.

Mr. PITTMAN. I did not say that. I said as it has now been construed it is hardly—I used the word "hardly"—more than that; but what I have done in the resolution is to attempt to save the teeth of the covenant of the league of nations so that after exempting immigration, after exempting the tariff, after exempting commerce, after exempting everything on earth we can think of exempting from the jurisdiction of the league, it shall be made plain that a nation may not then exempt itself from all jurisdiction of the league by simply a bare assertion that a question involves some of its internal affairs. If that were permitted, of course, no nation that feels itself in the wrong will ever submit its cause to the league of nations. Why? For the simple reason that it would say, "This is a question that involves our internal affairs or our domestic relations, and you have no power by which you can consider this claim. Therefore we are out of it." In other words, we would be in the same miserable position that we were with regard to our arbitration treaties, and that we are with our arbitration treaties to-day. They provided the whole machinery for arbitration, but in the very last clause of the treaty it was stated that no nation need submit to arbitration questions that affected its vital interests or its honor; and whenever an important question comes up before one of those arbitration boards—I do not care what it is—the nation involved simply bows and says, "I consider it affects my vital interests."

Mr. REED. Is the Senator willing to submit the vital interests or the honor of the United States to any tribunal on earth?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I am not; and this resolution does not do so. We can, however, go to work and designate the questions that may be submitted; and not only that, but in this whole agreement the Government is protected under article 1 in its right of withdrawal, and is protected under article 10, because there is no power provided, and no attempt to provide a power, to compel it to exercise any force in any war that may arise in Europe.

Mr. REED. We might differ about that, and we do most radically differ about that; but the Senator, as I understand, now means to say that no question involving the vital interest or the honor of the United States shall be submitted to any tribunal whatsoever. Of course, that withdraws all such questions from the league, and the Senator would be willing to have the league amended so that it would clearly reserve all such questions to the United States for its own decision?

Mr. PITTMAN. There is only one distinction. I would not be willing to put it within the power of the Senator from Missouri, nor anyone else who believes in national isolation to the extent that he does, to determine what constitutes a vital question.

Mr. REED. Exactly; but would the Senator submit the question whether a question was vital to the United States to a foreign tribunal on which the United States would not even be permitted to sit?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I would not. I would state what constituted the vital interests of this country.

Mr. REED. But the Senator would leave it for decision to a tribunal composed of foreigners, only one of whom probably can speak the English language?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is the same old speech, and I do not want to take up the time of the Senate replying to it.

Mr. REED. It is the same old speech, but I am waiting patiently for somebody to answer it.

Mr. PITTMAN. The trouble about the Senator is that he talks so long that no one else has much of a chance to answer.

Mr. REED. I do not know as to that; I have not made a speech in the Senate on the league of nations for six weeks.

Mr. PITTMAN. But every time the Senator ceases to speak here he goes to New York or to some other place to speak.

Mr. REED. It is true that I have made speeches elsewhere, and I invite any Senator to divide time with me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that the colloquy was simply to be a series of questions and answers.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator from Nevada very much.

Mr. PITTMAN. I apologize to the Senator from Missouri.

FOREIGN FINANCE CORPORATION.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I thoroughly appreciate the great and crowning importance of the league of nations. I am not sure that I might not be somewhat confused in deciding as between a moral and legal obligation, but I do not feel the slightest hesitancy in trying to have the Senate decide as to a business obligation. Last Monday I gave notice that at the first opportunity I would move, under Rule VIII, to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2472, which is known as the bill to provide for export financing. I hope that we realize the absolute importance of enacting into law some of the constructive measures which the business interests of our country greatly need and are eagerly waiting for. With the bill ready for consideration before the Senate, it having been reported some five or six weeks ago, I hope I may have the acquiescence of the Senate at least that debate may commence, if debate is necessary on this bill.

I appreciate that at 2 o'clock the unfinished business will come before the Senate, but I can not conceive that there will be any real opposition to the enactment of this bill into law after it is briefly explained. Some suggestions have been made by other Senators and amendments have been prepared to be offered to meet those objections.

I will read from last night's newspaper expressions from Lloyd-George and his appeal to the House of Commons on the economic situation abroad, and if that is not enough to convince us of the absolute necessity of providing a means for our manufacturers throughout this country to fill the orders they are getting from abroad, and to enable them to be paid for those orders, then it would be difficult for me to make it clearer. Lloyd-George, in his remarks, gives voice to this expression:

> We can not prosper—

Said Mr. Lloyd-George—

> we can not even exist without recovering and maintaining our international trade. We must bring up the trade balance, adding to our exports and lessening our imports.

That, of course, means exports to us.

> In every direction we are spending more and are earning less. We are consuming more and we are producing less. These are facts. It can not last.

Again he says:

> We must forget prewar conditions and deal with actualities.

He declared that he regarded the adverse American exchange rate as in itself protection against the importation of manufactured goods. To deal with the vagaries arising from the fluctuations in exchange the premier said the board of trade would be equipped with an emergency power to check sudden and undue importations of goods at prices below the cost of production of goods in Great Britain due to the collapse of exchange.

We have constructed a merchant marine of which we are very proud; but that merchant marine, in my judgment, might just as well be scrapped if we do not provide a way whereby it can transport American-made goods for which payment can be made abroad.

This bill has been prepared by the Federal Reserve Board and has the unqualified approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Glass, who says:

> * * * feel confident that its prompt enactment into law will afford an effective and altogether desirable means of greatly improving our foreign banking facilities and expanding the market for our export trade.

I read to the Senate when I last spoke on this subject—and I will not take the time to go over them again—extracts from Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. I should like to have the letter read. I did not have time to read it in the RECORD.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator refers to the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. I just read an extract from it, but I will be very glad to read the entire letter if the Senator desires.

Mr. GRONNA. I do.

Mr. EDGE. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury is as follows:

> THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
> Washington, August 16, 1919.
> Hon. WALTER E. EDGE,
> United States Senate.
> MY DEAR SENATOR: Responding to your note asking an expression of my views on S. 2472, to amend the Federal reserve act with a view to providing better facilities for financing the foreign trade of the United States, I beg to say that it is my considered judgment that the bill, with a few minor modifications, should be enacted into law. The amendments which I have in mind are those suggested in the letter of Gov. Harding to the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate under date of July 21, 1919, submitting the views of the Federal Reserve Board on the bill—

Those amendments have been incorporated in the bill under consideration—

> As chairman of the board, I fully concur with the expression of opinion made in the governor's letter. I entertain none of the misgivings of those who hesitate to support the measure, but, on the contrary, feel confident that its prompt enactment into law will afford an effective and altogether desirable means of greatly improving our foreign banking facilities and expanding the markets for our export trade.
> Sincerely, yours,
> CARTER GLASS.

Two paragraphs from the letter of the president of the American Manufacturers' Export Association, it seems to me, should appeal to every Member of this body:

> The critical period is at hand when the artificial post-war stimulus will cease and Europe will stop buying even necessities.
> The need, therefore, is urgent for immediate action by Congress and by bankers to tide over this critical period until Europe can get going once more.

I think we all agree, Mr. President, whatever our individual views may be on banking and exchange, that we must increase production, we must get as near 100 per cent production as possible. Around production centers everything, including national prosperity and the employment of men; and certainly we can not encourage production if we are not prepared to furnish the means by which the production can be marketed. We can not consume it all ourselves. I thoroughly appreciate that there may be certain types of production, food, for instance, on which temporary embargoes should be laid because of domestic conditions, but I am talking about the general, broad policy of trying to open up the markets of the world to American producers and to those who raise crops or whatever they may produce.

I had intended simply making a motion, and not attempting to discuss the bill. There is much that I can say for the bill if it is necessary; but it was my intention simply to make a motion under Rule VIII that the bill be taken up for consideration and amendment at this time. I have an amendment to offer myself, and I think the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has an amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). Unanimous consent is asked for the consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. GRONNA. I shall not grant unanimous consent. I shall object to that.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to know what is in this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. Therefore it can not be considered.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if the motion is agreed to I have a word to say. I am, of course, prepared to discuss the bill fully, but, as I understand, it is not subject to debate on a motion to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. EDGE. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair has just taken it. Has the Senator made a motion to consider this bill now, notwithstanding unanimous consent is not given?

Mr. EDGE. I did not ask unanimous consent, Mr. President. I simply made the motion under Rule VIII.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask if that motion is debatable at this hour?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, unfortunately I am not prepared to discuss this bill to-day. I did not know that it was the intention of the Senator of New Jersey to call the bill up to-day.

Mr. EDGE. May I interrupt the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. I think the Senator from North Dakota will agree that I spoke to him on Monday, stating that I was going to endeavor to bring the bill up this week, and would discuss the question of amendments with the Senator from Oklahoma, which I have done.

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly; that is correct. I repeat, however, that I was not aware of the fact that there was any intention of calling it up this morning. I am a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and, fortunately or unfortunately, I suppose I am about the only member who has made any objection to this bill. I want to say for the information of the Senate that it is perhaps one of the most far-reaching measures that has ever been presented to this body. I have no objection to the passage of any measure which will enable the people of this country who are possessed of great wealth to go into business in foreign lands. I think, however, the time has about come when we ought to try to take care of America first. The committee of which I have the honor of being chairman, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, is considering bills providing for the regulation of some of these corporations in the United States, and I assume that it will take us from 30 to 60 days to hear the witnesses who have indicated their willingness to be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just a moment. The Senator will pardon the Chair for announcing that the Chair has made an erroneous ruling regarding the character of this motion—as the Secretary suggests, being erroneously advised. Rule VIII provides that motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate. The Chair therefore will be compelled to reverse his ruling, and hold that this motion is not debatable.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from North Dakota, of course, will gladly submit to the new ruling of the Chair.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator from North Dakota in this connection?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. All I desire in the matter is to get some action. I am perfectly ready and want to hear objections to bills and suggested amendments, and see if we can not solve this great problem. As I understand the rules of the Senate—I am not particularly familiar with them, because of the short time I have been a Member—we now have under the head of unfinished business the so-called oil-leasing bill?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDGE. Would the Senator from North Dakota, if there is no further objection, be satisfied to join with the Senator from New Jersey to make this bill the unfinished business following the disposal of the oil-leasing bill? That may be weeks; I do not know; but it will give it a place on the calendar so that we can at least discuss it.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course the Senator from North Dakota has very little to say about making any bill the unfinished business.

Mr. EDGE. I think if he will join the Senator from New Jersey in this case, the Senate probably would not object to it, after this bill has been up three or four times, as it has.

Mr. GRONNA. I will simply say, Mr. President, if I may be permitted, that I propose, if I am able to do so, to state some of the reasons why I am opposed to this bill, and I think every Member of the Senate ought to know something about the provisions of the bill, because they are more far-reaching than is generally understood by the Members of this body. Of course the Senator can not hope to pass his bill before 2 o'clock.

Mr. EDGE. I simply want to get the bill in a position where I can meet any such suggestion as the Senator from North Dakota has made. I can not do it when it is not debatable, but I am endeavoring to place the bill in a position where it can be discussed. Certainly that is what we are here for.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] wishes to address the Senate on another question. So far as I am concerned, of course, I am perfectly willing to yield the floor, and the Senator has the same right to-morrow or some day in the future to move to take up his bill. It would be a waste of time to do so to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the motion of the Senator from New Jersey is before the Senate.

Mr. REED. What is the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2472. Unless it is withdrawn, the Chair will have to put the question.

Mr. FERNALD. I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is called for. The motion will go over.

Mr. EDGE. In view of the very few moments left before the time for the unfinished business to come before the Senate, of course I will not press my motion. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. EDGE. And again I give notice that I will renew the motion at the first opportunity.

INTERNATIONAL POLICY IN THE LEVANT AND THE FAR EAST.

Mr. MCCORMICK obtained the floor.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. MCCORMICK. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Colt	Edge	Gay
Ball	Cummins	Elkins	Gronna
Capper	Curtis	Fernald	Hale
Chamberlain	Dial	Fletcher	Harding

Henderson	Knox	Pittman	Trammell
Johnson, Calif.	La Follette	Reed	Walsh, Mass.
Johnson, S. Dak.	McCormick	Sheppard	Walsh, Mont.
Jones, N. Mex.	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.	Watson
Jones, Wash.	McKellar	Smoot	Williams
Kellogg	New	Spencer	Wolcott
Kendrick	Nugent	Stanley
Kenyon	Overman	Sterling
King	Owen	Thomas

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, in order that I may present a review of the perfidy and aggression which has been the basis of the establishment of empire in Africa and Asia as intelligently and as briefly as possible, I must ask, and very earnestly, that Senators will not interrupt me during the course of this review. If by any chance anything which I may suggest should give rise to a question, I ask that that question may await the conclusion of what I have to say.

The junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] addressed the Senate a month ago on the treaty of peace, in so far as it touched the subject of Shantung. A little later the Senator from Colorado submitted to Senators a consideration of the bases of an enduring peace in an address notable alike for its elevation of spirit and its calm candor. It was a deadly commentary upon the treaty before us. The influence of those speeches was felt in the country not less than in this Chamber. Senators turned to a renewed study, not only of the covenant of the league but of the terms of the treaty, to search for evidence of that enduring peace, for proof of that abiding justice, which certain supporters of the treaty have found in its text. We knew that China refused to be a party to the "world settlement" because of the wrongs she suffered under it. We could hear, in spite of the censor in France, the voice of reprobation, the audible remonstrances, of the French masses against the new imperialism which promises new wars. The cables brought us from England the indisputable evidence of by-election after by-election that the current of public opinion was moving irresistibly against the Lloyd-George government. British liberalism and British labor joined their protest to that of Jan Smuts against the terms of the treaty. Opinion in America began to change. Perhaps I ought to say more exactly that Americans began to study and to test by their own judgment and conscience the terms of the treaty, which had been withheld from them.

At first some of us had not been concerned with the disputes or agreements between the four principal Asiatic powers—France, Japan, Britain, and China—or with the doubtful issues of a European settlement which did not seem to touch us. Such disagreement as arose among us was over our future contractual relations with Europe and with Asia rather than over the terms which might be imposed on the vanquished or over the boundaries and economic privileges which might be established in central Europe or farther Asia. Then we were startled to realize that, acting in his own name and by his own proper authority, the President of the United States had put his name to an agreement which betrayed an ally and friend who had come into the war at our instance; which kept from the Chinese that which was his, and of which he had been robbed with equal hypocrisy and violence. When the junior Senator from Nebraska spoke the amicable dismemberment of lower Asia Minor by Greece and Italy had not begun; we were not very well aware of differences between France and England and the Hedjaz over Syria; news of the bickering over Thrace had not reached us; the Anglo-Persian treaty had not animated our faint memories of the history of that European conquest and empire in Asia which draws France and Britain to Japan, and which this treaty plans that we shall guarantee to the conquerors.

Thus it was that we began to examine the "world settlement." Ours was a peculiar position. Our continental domain had been extended, not over territories inhabited by old and dense populations, but over vast empty spaces which awaited the coming of civilization. From the beginning our institutions had been democratic, republican, and unmilitarist. No pressure of population, no urge for economic expansion, had tempted us to bring ancient civilizations under our economic or political control or to break our plighted word. I will not say that we were more virtuous than other peoples, but that, more happily circumstanced than they, we have not been tempted in the past to do that which other powers have done and against which the enlightened conscience of to-day revolts. More than that, we had not had to battle for our very lives during the first years of the Great War. The Government of the United States, through the President, had announced to the world that "the United States must be neutral in fact as well as in name during these days that are to try men's souls. We must be impartial in thought as well as in action; must put a curb upon our sentiments." As late as May, 1916, he had said, speaking of the war, "with its causes and its objects we are not concerned. The obscure fountains from which this stupendous flood has burst forth we are not interested to search for or explore."

It was during these years that other powers made desperate bargains for help, and entered into sordid engagements with the Russian autocracy for the division of the spoils among the victors.

Mr. President, while America, with increased anxiety, began to examine the terms of the treaty, the echoes of the speech of the Senator from Nebraska were heard in Asia and in Europe. The Senator from Nebraska spoke on the floor of this Chamber. Aye, but he spoke, too, on the soil where "the embattl'd farmers stood and fired the shot heard 'round the world."

The truth, the plain, the simple, the elemental truth, spoken out of the heart and conscience of America, led exalted Japanese and a no less exalted American to explanations. Baron Uchida and Mr. Hara spoke of the conditions—the conditions, mark you—under which some certain Chinese rights would be restored to China. The restoration, after all, is not to be unconditional. Nothing which Japan does in China is unconditional. The explanation in behalf of the American Government indicated that although we were ready to guarantee to Japan privileges of which Germany had robbed China, yet we refused to acknowledge the negotiations between China and Japan to that same end. In brief, the Government of the United States wishes to assent to the wrong done China in Shantung upon the verbal assurance of Baron Makino that presently the wrong will be undone. At the same time we virtuously eschew public acknowledgment of the collateral facts. Ostrichlike, our Government has declined to recognize that the promises of the great Asiatic military power fronting our Pacific coast are to be measured by her performances in the past. By that measurement the promises are worthless.

Although "enlightened expediency" may stop the ears of the American peace delegates, the Senate can not be deaf to the truth. For 35 years Japanese foreign policy in Asia has been one of consistent perfidy and aggression. I defy anyone to make candid answer to that charge. The wonderful material advance of Japan was contemporaneous with that of modern Prussia, and in close imitation of it. Japanese society, the Japanese constitution, the Japanese junkerthum, the Japanese monarchy, the Japanese Army, all have been molded in Prussian lines. The diplomacy of Japan has been patterned after that of Frederick the Great in its disregard of truth, solemn pledges, and human rights. If anyone doubts this, let him review his own memory of Japan's relations with China and Korea, her secret and now discovered violation of the pledges exchanged with the Government of the United States.

It was in 1884, after half a dozen years of covert intermeddling in Korea, that Japan landed troops in that country on the score of certain domestic disturbances. China, then the nominal suzerain of Korea, did likewise. In 1885 the troops were withdrawn under a Sino-Japanese treaty which, by implication at least, recognized the independent status of Korea. Ten years later, in the spring of 1894, another uprising—that of the Tong-Chaks—led to renewed military intervention by Japan and China. The Japanese kidnapped the Empress, who opposed them, made a palace revolution, placed a regent of their own choice on the throne of the Emperor, and began war on China—began war to assert the independence of Korea. The Japanese victory was complete. The Pescadores and Formosa were ceded to Japan. China agreed to pay a great indemnity and to cede to Japan the now famous Liao-Tung Peninsula "in perpetuity and full sovereignty." Although the treaty recognized the full and complete independence and autonomy of Korea, the Japanese resumed their policy of penetration. Japanese swarmed over the country interfering in its feeble administration and terrorizing its people. Finally their most resolute opponent, the Empress, was murdered by Japanese bravos.

It is unnecessary to rehearse the circumstances under which the European powers in 1895 required the re-cession of the Liao-Tung to China or of the history of its lease by Russia in 1898 for a period of 25 years. Russia began her railway building in Manchuria, and there followed the politico-economic rivalry between czaristic Russia and imperial Japan which led to the Anglo-Japanese treaty in 1902 and to the Russo-Japanese War in 1904.

Now, mark the successive steps by which Japan seized upon the body of prostrate and defenseless Korea, and with what gratuitous perfidy the Japanese Government, by treaty or through the utterances of her statesmen, disclaimed her sinister intentions almost at the moment when they were to be carried out. Japan had formally recognized Korean independence in 1895. In February of 1904 Japan, again by treaty, recognized and guaranteed the independence and territorial integrity of Korea; in August of 1904 it was provided by treaty that Japan should appoint a financial adviser to the Korean Government; provision was made by the agreement of April, 1905, that the administration of Korean posts and telegraphs be transferred to Japan. In June of that year the first open hint of a Japanese protectorate was heard. In November, 1905, Korea confided the control of her foreign relations to the Japanese Government, which gave formal and public pledge that this control of foreign relations would be restored to Korea as soon as she might be able to resume the responsibility for their conduct. A Japanese protectorate now existed in fact; but it was not until July of 1907 that the protectorate over Korea was at last proclaimed. In the following year Marquis Ito categorically declared that Japan had no intention of annexing Korea. Two years later—15 years after Japan had fought China to assure Korean independence—in the year of our Lord 1910, there were published to the world the abdication of the Korean Emperor and the annexation of Korea to Japan.

It may be said in extenuation of Japan's aggression upon Korea that she only followed the example of Great Britain, which went to war with China in order to force her to permit the importation of opium, and, as an additional reward of victory, wrung from her the cession of Hongkong. It may be said that in Korea Japan did only that which France had done in Indo-China, and that subsequently she mended her ways. But not so. During the course of the Great War Japan twice broke her solemn understanding with the United States and, in deliberate secret violation of her other international engagements, sought to reduce China to the state of vassalage in which Britain holds Egypt and into which she is drawing Persia.

I shall not tax Senators with a long review of Japanese aggressions upon China, or, indeed, of the injuries done her by the great Christian powers subsequently allied in the war against Germany. I merely ask leave to print in this context a chronology of events which involves France and Britain, as well as Germany and Russia, in the complicity of aggression against China. In March, 1898, there were signed the treaties under which China was compelled to part with sovereign rights in Shantung to Germany, and at Port Arthur and in the Liao-Tung to Russia—treaties by which China yielded up to foreign Governments the right to build and to guard with military police railroads, which struck at her very power of self-defense. France and Britain (which had joined Russia and Germany to compel Japan to re-cede the Liao-Tung in 1895) now seized Wei-hai-wei and Kwang Chow Wang. If the Russian and German autocrats were to rob China, the great European democracies must vindicate their power and prestige by becoming thieves too!

It was in the following year that Mr. Secretary Hay vainly endeavored to establish a concert among the great powers to protect the sovereignty and integrity of China and to assure the open door. Then, during the year of 1900, the outraged Chinese made futile resistance against aggression in the Boxer uprising. You remember, sir, with what painful anxiety we waited for news of the missionaries and the diplomats besieged in the British Legation at Peking. That uprising, that siege, are ominous of the years to come, when either the 400,000,000 Chinese, once subjected to Japan, may be marshaled against the Republic which betrayed them, or, resisting subjugation, may rise to join the Koreans to drive the invaders from the eastern shores of continental Asia. Then, as the Senator from Montana has boldly and honestly said, then under the terrible tenth article of the covenant of the league we shall be bound in honor to levy our legions, to send forth our young men by the million in defense of the Japanese dominions on the farther shores of the Yellow Sea.

But I am running ahead of the necessary review of the moral abasement which characterized the conduct of the great Christian powers in Asia before and during the Great War. In 1904 Japan took from Russia the very Liao-Tung which Russia and the rest of Europe had once denied her. Fifteen years ago the Mikado in Manchuria succeeded to the spoils of the brigand Czar as to-day in Shantung he has seized those of the brigand Kaiser. Under the first Anglo-Japanese alliance Japan was able to fight Russia.

Under the third and fourth articles of the second Anglo-Japanese alliance Japan exchanged the privilege to work her will upon Korea for the privilege accorded Britain to work her will upon China in those high plains which touch the Indian frontier. The two great Asiatic autocrats—the Emperor of India and the Emperor of Japan—had entered into mutual bonds for the defense of their domains and the expansion of their influence. Now there joined Japan a third Asiatic power—France. Ah, yes; dauntless and democratic France; imperishable and glorious France, whose sons under those almost legendary Kings, Merovius and Charles Martel, flung themselves into the bloody breach at Chalons and at Tours as they did under their citizen marshal at the Marne and Verdun; France, who thus thrice held the field while laggard civilization made ready in her own defense. France in Europe, sir, is a democracy, but in Asia she governs through oriental satrapies. In 1907 France and Japan entered into a convention for the securing of their conquests upon the Continent of Asia. Was this an unnatural alliance? I will not say; but I will recall that at the foundation of French dominion over Indo-China lie the corpses of murdered Christians, sad and sardonic brothers of those other lowly servants of the Crucified whose violent end was the signal for the violent beginning of German rule in Shantung. The martyrdom of Christian missionaries was the signal for conquest.

The Root-Takahira agreement of 1908 was hailed as an omen of a better understanding, a more straightforward policy by all the powers in the Far East. It was pacific, unmilitary, and unselfish in its terms. But, as soon as Europe was securely locked in the death grapple and Kiaochow was in Japanese hands, the Imperial Japanese Government made the boldest and most perfidious attempt it had ever made upon the sovereignty of China. In January of 1915, secretly and with threats of reprisal if they should be published or refused, Japan presented twenty-one demands to China. I shall not recite them here, but at the proper moment I shall ask that they be included, with other notes; treaties, public and secret, which I shall ask the consent of the Senate to have published in this connection. If China had acceded in full to the demands—the control of her military forces, her internal administration, and her revenues in good measure—all would have passed into Japanese hands. China would have become a mere subject and vassal State, like Egypt. But China, in part, rejected the twenty-one demands. Then in 1916 Japan, having failed to have her way in China, joined with Russia in a secret treaty aimed at the United States. Its text, first published by the Russian revolutionists, is included among the papers which I shall append to this sorry review.

Japan sought to keep China out of the war. After China broke off diplomatic relations with Germany, under the urging of the United States, Japan for six months delayed her joining the belligerents. Japan demanded of France and Britain—and Britain and France granted her, in their necessity—promises to support her claims to Shantung. It was in ignorance of these promises that Mr. Lansing joined in the Lansing-Ishii agreement.

The Russian minister at Tokyo sent his Government a confidential report on the Japanese view of the agreement. That was also published by the Russian revolutionaries, and in part is as follows:

> To my question whether he (the Japanese minister of foreign affairs) did not fear that in the future misunderstandings might arise from the different interpretations by Japan and the United States of the meaning of the terms, "special position" and "special interests" of Japan in China, Viscount Motono replied by saying that—[a gap in the original]. Nevertheless, I gain the impression from the words of the minister that he is conscious of the possibility of misunderstandings also in the future, but is of the opinion that in such a case Japan would have better means at her disposal for carrying into effect her interpretation than the United States.

This is the Japan to whose easily spoken and easily broken word we are asked to confide the rights of millions of Chinamen. We are asked to remand the guardianship of Chinese rights, through the council of the league, to those other Governments whose records in Asia must shame thousands of Englishmen and Frenchmen, whose faith in democracy and whose stout hearts helped overthrow the Hohenzollern autocrat. Look at the map. Trace the boundaries and the history of the European invasion of Africa and of Asia and see upon what exemplars Japan has patterned her policy. Mark the confines of the dominions, mark the extending spheres of influence of France, Britain, and Japan, the three imperial powers remaining in the world. Their dominion now extends over a third of the habitable surface of the globe, and under their sway live well-nigh 500,000,000 sullen subject peoples, brought under this governance by force, and by force kept under its subjection.

The covenant and the treaty which we are asked to approve "consolidates the interests," as the diplomats say, and guarantees with our blood the territorial acquisitions of the three principal powers holding dominion over subject peoples—Britain, Japan, and France.

The method of acquisition differed, although the end was always the same. International exigency, great diplomatic occasions, the sudden necessities of defeated powers, the peril of those actually at war, all have been seized upon from time to time to regularize, to make respectable, to confirm legally, what by degrees had become established, as the long period of British penetration in Persia has become a protectorate de facto by the treaty just made.

Algiers was conquered after 14 years of cruel warfare, begun when a punitive expedition was sent merely to chastise the insolent Bey of that country.

In Madagascar French interest led to a French protectorate, and then to conquest by France—planned, unblushing, deliberate, calculated conquest.

Thus it was in India, but upon a vast, an imperial, plan—India, where British rule rests upon the divisions among the Indian peoples, upon the presence of British troops, upon the bayonets of those native mercenaries with whom the Frenchman, Dupleix, taught the British to conquer native dynasties and to overawe native populations.

Mr. President, this is not the charge of an Indian miscreant, a rebel against the British imperial Raj, or of a wild Irish Sinn Feiner. It is not the testimony of a Tilak or a De Valera. It is not the view of an American theorist, but of Seeley, the English historian of the "Expansion of England."

In India—

The Government does not rest—

He says—

as in England upon the consent of the people or upon some native constituency * * *. The Government is in every respect—race, religion, habits—foreign to the people. There is only one body of persons of which we can positively affirm that without its support the Government could not stand; this is the army. Of this army, one part is English * * *, but it is less than a third part of the whole. The other two-thirds are bound to us by nothing but their pay and the feeling of honor which impels a good soldier to be true to his flag.

Lord Wellesley, as governor general in 1798, * * * first laid down the theory of intervention and annexation. Later again it was adopted with a kind of fanaticism by the last of the governors general who ruled in the time of the company, Lord Dalhousie.

Lord Dalhousie in particular stands out in history as a ruler of the type of Frederick the Great, and did deeds which are almost as difficult to justify as the seizure of Silesia or the partition of Poland.

The Senator from Idaho and Joseph Folk, of Missouri, have made Senators familiar with the record of the British occupation of Egypt. That occupation began when an army was landed, nominally in support of the Turkish viceroy, the Khedive, and actually to insure the collection of the debt due British bondholders. The early years of its indefinite continuance were punctuated by promises of evacuation. There were deliberate undertakings that Britain would leave Egypt, by Lord Granville and Lord Dufferin, and, most notably, by Lord Salisbury and Mr. Gladstone. In reply to a proposal made in the House of Lords that the British occupation should become permanent, Lord Salisbury said:

My noble friend pays an insufficient regard to the sanctity of the obligations which the Government of the Queen have undertaken, and by which they are bound to abide.

Mr. Gladstone, as prime minister, was no less explicit when, in the House of Commons, in 1883 he said:

We are against it [annexation] on the ground of the specific and solemn pledges given to the world in the most solemn manner and under the most critical circumstances—pledges which have earned for us the confidence of Europe at large during the course of difficult and delicate operations, and which, if one pledge can be more sacred and solemn than another, special sacredness in this case binds us to observe.

That was 35 years before the British Cabinet, in the name of His Britannic Majesty, deposed the Khedive who, in theory, reigned by the consent of the Egyptians and the firman of the Turk, and appointed in his stead, and as of right, a sultan.

Now we have news of a convention between Persia and Great Britain. It seems that the Persians, like the Egyptians, have been refused a hearing and help at the peace conference in Paris. As Disraeli, who represented the British Empire at the congress of Berlin, secretly from the other conferees bartered the support of British arms for the Grand Turk in exchange for Cyprus, now, so secretly that even the Persian delegation in Paris knew nothing of it, Britain has negotiated this far-reaching convention with Persia.

I submit to Senators a statement embodied in a cable dispatch published this morning:

The delegation—

That is, the Persian delegation—had no knowledge of the agreement until it was published last week, although rumors that the British were attempting to bring it about reached here last March.

"Whoever controls the finances, railroads, and army of a nation controls that nation, and Persia's independence, therefore, is a thing of the past," said the secretary. "We saw President Wilson several times, and he told us Persia would be invited to join the league and that article 10 would guarantee its complete independence in the future. He also agreed to support our claims when the Ottoman question was taken up here.

"Does the President intend to insist that the American Senate adopt article 10 without change and yet allow Great Britain to defy its most important principle in Persia's case? If so, the league is a sham."

I have no comment to make upon that statement; it is complete in itself. With it the news comes that the cold embers of France's age-old hate for England have flamed up in sudden indignation. The French press is bitter. The Socialist organ, Le Populaire, says:

The Persians now understand why Lloyd-George gave up China to Japan.

A cable dispatch published yesterday in New York summarizes a long editorial in the leading conservative newspaper of France, in part, as follows:

Le Temps declares the agreement with Britain is a distinct violation of the league of nations covenant. It asserts the presence of British troops makes it impossible for the people of Persia properly to express their views and wishes.

To the newspaper, the Persian promise virtually to hand over the Persian Army to British officers and Persian finances to British specialists means practically the elimination of Persia's independence.

L'Echo de Paris, which in the past has been reputed to be the mouthpiece of the French prime minister, says:

If the above stipulations do not constitute a most complete protectorate, then words have lost their meaning. Doubtless nowhere is a formal protectorate mentioned, and doubtless a clause announces the independence and full integrity of Persia, but the substance of the agreement will fool no one.

The British Manchester Guardian, one of the two principal organs of British liberalism, says:

If these things had been done by any other power we should say that they amounted to a veiled protectorate.

The Tory London Post writes in the same vein.

We learn that the statement has been made by Frank L. Polk, in charge of American interests at the peace conference, that the American Government knew nothing officially of the Persian negotiations. It would appear, Mr. President, that Mr. Polk's lack of information is as abysmal as that of Mr. Lansing.

Nevertheless, the cables carry the statement of Cecil Harmsworth, undersecretary for foreign affairs, in the House of Commons, of which I read a part:

The policy of His Majesty's Government is to assist Persia to reestablish herself on a sound basis. There is not the slightest foundation for a suspicion that the Government proposed, or that the Persian Government would have consented, to create anything in the nature of a protectorate.

Mr. Harmsworth hardly will be surprised if we recall the circumstances under which Lord Beaconsfield "leased" Cyprus from the Turk, secretly from his colleagues at the congress of Berlin. The "lease" held until Britain asserted sovereignty and later transferred the island to Greece. Mr. Harmsworth will not be surprised if, contemplating what seems to some of us to be the ignorance and ineptitude of some of our representatives, we recall the asseverations of Lord Salisbury and Mr. Gladstone in regard to Egypt:

Persicos odi, puer, apparatus.

Roman Horace may have loathed the riches of Persia, but not so the British statesmen, who see in Mesopotamia the equal rivals of our cotton fields, and who have found in Persia one of the great oil basins of the world.

The pax Britannica, which to see is to admire, is the handmaiden of plenty. We may see written on yonder map the time when the looms of Leeds and the mills of Manchester will spin yarns and weave cloths without recourse to the cotton markets of Memphis or Charleston or New Orleans.

By the conquest of German East Africa the British Empire completed the "all-red" route from the Cape to Cairo. Now by the consummation of the Persian treaty and by the addition of two other newly subject or vassal States to her Empire, Britain has completed the "all-red" route from Cairo to Calcutta.

I do not decry the service to civilization of the British Empire. It has carried highways into the wilderness. It has made two blades to grow where one grew before. It has abolished suttee and slavery. It has brought peace to millions. But that has been a policeman's peace. Through the long generations which have witnessed the growth of that splendid Empire in India, more splendid than any from that of Greek Alexander to that of Aurungzebe, there has been no broadening base of government, no effort to bring schools to the people and the people to the schools. The general illiteracy of Egypt to-day is as great as it was when, nearly 40 years ago, Arabi Pasha fell before the British armies.

What is true of the British is true of the French and the Japanese dominions over subject peoples. They have brought material prosperity, but no democratic progress. Almost wherever you go among those myriad millions in Asia and Africa you find sedition and rebellion. You would have found, even this year and last, imprisonment without trial and summary deportation of political agitators. You would have found, in greater proportion to-day than for generations, British troops. You would have found, in India, British garrisons which had replaced Indian troops. Look at the long borders of those subject peoples; count the thousands of miles they march with those of China and Russia. They touch upon the Russian Pamirs and the Russian Caucasus. If ever those subject peoples rise, and the Chinese or the Russians strike hands with them for freedom, that will constitute "external aggression" under the covenant. Then our young men must march by thousands to drive the invader back from the Yalu, the Ganges, the Tigris, or the Euphrates.

Happily, Mr. President, there is no longer any difference among Senators over the meaning of article 10. We owe very largely to the candor and courage of the senior Senator from Montana the agreement here—that for each of the nations which may subscribe to it the obligation is one of honor and unqualified. If the United States become a party to it, although our frontiers require no guarantors, although there are no possible enemies against whom we must summon help, America, the great reservoir of treasure and of man power, becomes the guarantor of all the frontiers of the world, including those of the far-flung autocracies of France and Britain.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator let me conclude? I am nearly through with my remarks.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMICK. Surely the British statesmen who penned the text of the covenant knew when they wrote articles 4 and 11 that smoldering revolution among those subject millions must break out in the future.

> The council may deal * * * with any matter * * * affecting the peace of the world. (Art. 4.)
> Any threat of war * * * is declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations. (Art. 11.)
> It is also declared to be the fundamental right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb either the peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends. (Art. 11.)

Ponder these provisions in connection with a paragraph buried in the midst of the long fifteenth article of the covenant, and which did not appear in the first published draft.

> If the council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice.

It is not a pleasant task to review the conquests, the pledges broken or forgotten, which are an inseparable part of the history of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, but unless it be done we can not understand how the European democracies are caught in the chains of the very peoples whom they hold in subjection. It is only thus that we can understand how the present terms of the covenant may call us to war to keep those subject peoples in bondage.

There was a time, Mr. President, when the language of France was as common to my ears and to my lips as that in which we speak. It was in her tongue that I was taught to ask for Guidance which we should implore to-day. As two natures struggle in the breast of man, so are there two in France. There is the France whose sons died for liberty with a heroism beyond compare, and a France whose conquering armies carried her eagles from Moscow almost to Gibraltar. In the lifetime of men in this chamber, she has followed the third Napoleon and Boulanger, as well as Thiers and Gambetta.

Like forces are at work against one another in England—the England which has spoken through the lips of Hampden and Gladstone, no less than through those of Lord North and Disraeli; great England, stout of heart, reverent of the law, who held out to the world the first example of representative government! But the seat of the mother of parliaments is the capital of an empire over hundreds of subject millions. If we subscribe to the imperialist obligations and the reactionary purposes of the tenth and eleventh articles of the covenant, if we join in the spoil of China, we shall give new life to the spirit of imperialism which has been born of the victory; we shall fall the men in Europe who have dared to protest against this treaty.

> Woe unto the world because of offenses; for it must be that offenses come; but woe unto that man by whom the offense cometh.

Great powers, political and financial, are eager to frighten and to coerce, to drive Senators to subordinate judgment to expediency. During the long months which followed the armistice, was anything done to reduce the costs of living for the people of this land? They were heavy in January and February, as well as in July and August. No process was invoked and no appeal was made to lighten the burden then, but now we must haste.

In our haste let us not forget that in the awakening Orient, in China, and in those conquered empires yonder, there are twice as many millions as there were in all the countries of western Europe which were engaged in the war. If we shrink from our duty, if we consent to the guaranty of territories, if we consent that America shall be an instrument to repress revolution, we shall not only consecrate the wrongs of the past, but by our act we shall pledge America against conscience and judgment to take part in the great war which this treaty promises. Our young men will go forth to defend cities of which they never heard. In the high places of Asia, the snow will cover the frozen bodies of Americans perhaps now unborn, and American mothers—little girls to-day, mayhap, playing in the summer air about the dooryards—will mourn their sons fallen in the desert wastes of Syria and Egypt.

CONVENTION BETWEEN CHINA AND JAPAN FOR THE WITHDRAWAL OF CHINESE AND JAPANESE TROOPS FROM KOREA, APRIL 18, 1885.

It is hereby agreed that China shall withdraw her troops now stationed in Korea, and that Japan shall withdraw hers stationed therein for the protection of her legation. The specific term for effecting the same shall be four months, commencing from the date of the signing and sealing of this convention, within which term they shall respectively accomplish the withdrawal of the whole number of each of their troops, in order to avoid effectively any complications between the respective countries; the Chinese troops shall embark from Masan-Po and the Japanese from the port of Ninsen.

The said respective powers mutually agree to invite the King of Korea to instruct and drill a sufficient armed force, that she may herself assure her public security, and to invite him to engage into his service an officer or officers from amongst those of a third power, who shall be intrusted with the instruction of the said force. The respective powers also bind themselves, each to the other, henceforth not to send any of their own officers to Korea for the purpose of giving said instruction.

In case of any disturbance of a grave nature occurring in Korea which necessitates the respective countries, or either of them, to send troops to Korea it is hereby understood that they shall give, each to the other, previous notice in writing of their intention so to do, and that after the matter is settled they shall withdraw their troops and not further station them there.

TREATY OF PEACE BETWEEN CHINA AND JAPAN, APRIL, 1895.

ARTICLE I. China recognizes definitely the full and complete independence and autonomy of Korea, and in consequence the payment of tribute and the performance of ceremonies and formalities by Korea, in derogation of such independence and autonomy, shall wholly cease for the future.

THE "OPEN-DOOR" PROPOSALS OF SECRETARY OF STATE HAY.

SEPTEMBER 6, 1899.

To the AMERICAN AMBASSADOR TO GERMANY:

At the time when the Government of the United States was informed by that of Germany that it had leased from His Majesty the Emperor of China the port of Kiaochow and the adjacent territory in the Province of Shantung assurances were given to the ambassador of the United States at Berlin by the imperial German minister for foreign affairs that the rights and privileges insured by treaties with China to citizens of the United States would not thereby suffer or be in any wise impaired within the area over which Germany had thus obtained control.

More recently, however, the British Government recognized by a formal agreement with Germany the exclusive right of the latter country to enjoy in said leased area and the contiguous "sphere of influence or interest" certain privileges, more especially those relating to railroads and mining enterprises, but as the exact nature and extent of the rights thus recognized have not beeen clearly defined it is possible that serious conflicts of interests may at any time arise not only between the British and German subjects within said area but that the interests of our citizens may also be jeopardized thereby.

Earnestly desirous to remove any cause of irritation and to insure at the same time to the commerce of all nations in China the undoubted benefits which should accrue from a formal recognition by the various powers claiming "spheres of interest" that they shall enjoy perfect equality of treatment for their commerce and navigation within such "spheres," the Government of the United States would be pleased to see His German Majesty's Government give formal assurances and lend its cooperation in securing like assurances from the other interested powers, that each within its respective sphere of whatever influence—

First. Will in no way interfere with any treaty port or any vested interest within any so-called "sphere of interest" or leased territory it may have in China.

Second. That the Chinese treaty tariff of the time being shall apply to all merchandise landed or shipped to all such ports as are within said "sphere of interest" (unless they be "free ports"), no matter to what nationality it may belong, and that duties so leviable shall be collected by the Chinese Government.

Third. That it will levy no higher harbor dues on vessels of another nationality frequenting any port in such "sphere" than shall be levied on vessels of its own nationality and no higher railroad charges over lines built, controlled, or operated within its "sphere" on merchandise belonging to citizens or subjects of other nationalities transported through such "sphere" than shall be levied on similar merchandise belonging to its own nationals transported over equal distances.

The liberal policy pursued by His Imperial German Majesty in declaring Kiaochow a free port and in aiding the Chinese Government in the establishment there of a customhouse are so clearly in line with the propositions which this Government is anxious to see recognized that it entertains the strongest hope that Germany will give its acceptance and hearty support.

The recent ukase of His Majesty the Emperor of Russia declaring the port of Ta-lien-wan open during the whole of the lease under which it is held from China to the merchant ships of all nations, coupled with the categorical assurances made to this Government by His Imperial Majesty's representative at this capital at the time, and since repeated to me by the present Russian ambassador, seem to insure support of the Emperor to the proposed measure. Our ambassador at the Court of St. Petersburg has in consequence been instructed to submit it to the Russian Government and to request their early consideration of it. A copy of my instruction on the subject to Mr. Tower is herewith inclosed for your confidential information.

The commercial interests of Great Britain and Japan will be so clearly served by the desired declaration of intentions and the views of the Governments of these countries as to the desirability of the adoption of measures insuring the benefits of equality of treatment of all foreign trade throughout China are so similar to those entertained by the United States that their acceptance of the proposition herein outlined and their cooperation in advocating their adoption by the other powers can be confidently expected.

FIRST ANGLO-JAPANESE ALLIANCE, 1902.

ARTICLE 1. The high contracting parties, having mutually recognized the independence of China and Korea, declare themselves to be entirely uninfluenced by any aggressive tendencies in either country. Having in view, however, their special interests, of which those of Great Britain relate principally to China, while Japan, in addition to the interests which she possesses in China, is interested in a peculiar degree politically, as well as commercially and industrially, in Korea, the high contracting parties recognize that it will be admissible for either of them to take such measures as may be indispensable in order to safeguard those interests if threatened either by the aggressive action of any other power, or by disturbances arising in China or Korea, and necessitating the intervention of either of the high contracting parties for the protection of the lives and property of its subjects.

ART. 2. If either Great Britain or Japan, in the defense of their respective interests as above described, should become involved in war with another power the other high contracting power will maintain a strict neutrality, and use its efforts to prevent others from joining in hostilities against its ally.

ART. 3. If, in the above event, any other power or powers should join in hostilities against that ally, the other high contracting party will come to its assistance, and will conduct the war in common, and will make peace in mutual agreement with it.

PROTOCOL BETWEEN JAPAN AND KOREA, FEBRUARY, 1904.

ART. 2. The Imperial Government of Japan shall in a spirit of firm friendship insure the safety and repose of the Imperial House of Korea.

ART. 3. The Imperial Government of Japan unconditionally guarantee the independence and territorial integrity of the Korean Empire.

SECOND ANGLO-JAPANESE ALLIANCE, 1905.

ARTICLE 1. It is agreed that whenever, in the opinion of either Great Britain or Japan, any of the rights and interests referred to in the preamble of this agreement are in jeopardy, the two Governments will communicate with one another fully and frankly, and will consider in common the measures which should be taken to safeguard those menaced rights or interests.

ART. 2. If by reason of unprovoked attack or aggressive action, wherever arising, on the part of any other power or powers either contracting party should be involved in war in defense of its territorial rights or special interests mentioned in the preamble of this agreement, the other contracting party will at once come to the assistance of its ally, and will conduct the war in common, and make peace in mutual agreement with it.

ART. 3. Japan possessing paramount political, military, and economic interests in Korea, Great Britain recognizes the right of Japan to take such measures of guidance, control, and protection in Korea as she may deem proper and necessary to safeguard and advance those interests, provided always that such measures are not contrary to the principle of equal opportunities for the commerce and industry of all nations.

ART. 4. Great Britain having a special interest in all that concerns the security of the Indian frontier, Japan recognizes her right to take such measures in the proximity of that frontier as she may find necessary for safeguarding her Indian possessions.

FRANCO-JAPANESE TREATY, 1907.

The Governments of Japan and France, being agreed to respect the independence and integrity of China, as well as the principle of equal treatment in that country for the commerce and subjects or citizens of all nations, and having a special interest to have the order and pacific state of things preserved, especially in the regions of the Chinese Empire adjacent to the territories where they have the rights of sovereignty, protection, or occupation, engage to support each other for assuring the peace and security in those regions, with a view to maintain the respective situation and the territorial rights of the two high contracting parties in the Continent of Asia.

ROOT-TAKAHIRA AGREEMENT, 1908.

ART. 4. They (the United States and Japan) are also determined to preserve the common interests of all powers in China by supporting by all pacific means at their disposal the independence and integrity of China and the principle of equal opportunity for commerce and industry of all nations in the Empire.

ART. 5. Should any event occur threatening the status quo as above described or the principle of equal opportunity as above defined, it remains for the two Governments to communicate with each other in order to arrive at an understanding as to what measures they may consider it useful to take.

DECLARATION OF ANNEXATION OF KOREA BY JAPAN, SIGNED ON AUGUST 22, 1910, AND PROMULGATED ON THE 29TH OF AUGUST.

ARTICLE 1. His Majesty, the Emperor of Korea, makes complete and permanent cession to His Majesty, the Emperor of Japan, of all rights of sovereignty over the whole of Korea.

ART. 2. His Majesty, the Emperor of Japan, accepts the cession mentioned in the preceding article, and consents to the complete annexation of Korea to the Empire of Japan.

ART. 3. His Majesty, the Emperor of Japan, will accord to their majesties the Emperor and ex-Emperor and his Imperial Highness, the Crown Prince of Korea, and their consorts and heirs such titles, dignity, and honor as are appropriate to their respective ranks, and sufficient annual grants will be made for the maintenance of such titles, dignity, and honor.

ART. 4. His Majesty the Emperor of Japan will also accord appropriate honor and treatment to the members of the Imperial House of Korea and their heirs, other than those mentioned in the preceding article, and the funds necessary for the maintenance of such honor and treatment will be granted.

ART. 5. His Majesty the Emperor of Japan will confer peerages and monetary grants upon those Koreans who, on account of meritorious services, are regarded as deserving such special recognition.

ART. 6. In consequence of the aforesaid annexation, the Government of Japan assumes the entire government and administration of Korea and undertakes to afford full protection for the persons and property of Koreans obeying the laws there in force, and to promote the welfare of all such Koreans.

ART. 7. The Government of Japan will, so far as circumstances permit, employ in the public service of Japan in Korea those Koreans who accept the new régime loyally and in good faith and who are duly qualified for such service.

ART. 8. This treaty, having been approved by His Majesty the Emperor of Japan and His Majesty the Emperor of Korea, shall take effect from the date of its promulgation.

JAPAN'S ORIGINAL 21 DEMANDS, JANUARY 18, 1915.

GROUP I.

The Japanese Government and the Chinese Government being desirous of maintaining the general peace in eastern Asia, and further strengthening the friendly relations and good neighborhood existing between the two nations, agree to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The Chinese Government engages to give full assent to all matters upon which the Japanese Government may hereafter agree with the German Government relating to the disposition of all rights, interests, and concessions which Germany, by virture of treaties, or otherwise, possesses in relation to the Province of Shantung.

ART. 2. The Chinese Government engages that within the Province of Shantung and along its coast no territory or island will be ceded or leased to a third power under any pretext.

ART. 3. The Chinese Government consents to Japan's building a railway from Chefoo, or Lungkow, to join the Kiaochow-Tsinanfu Railway.

ART. 4. The Chinese Government engages, in the interest of trade and for the residence of foreigners, to open by herself as soon as possible certain important cities and towns in the Province of Shantung as commercial ports. What places are to be opened are to be jointly decided upon in a separate agreement.

GROUP II.

The Japanese Government and the Chinese Government, since the Chinese Government has always acknowledged the special position enjoyed by Japan in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia, agree to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The two contracting powers mutually agree that the term of lease of Port Arthur and Dalny and the term of lease of the South Manchurian Railway and the Antung-Mukden Railway shall be extended to the period of 99 years.

ART. 2. Japanese subjects in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia shall have the right to lease or own land required either for erecting suitable buildings for trade and manufacture or for farming.

ART. 3. Japanese subjects shall be free to reside and travel in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia and to engage in business and in manufacture of any kind whatsoever.

ART. 4. The Chinese Government agrees to grant to Japanese subjects the right of opening mines in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia. As regards what mines shall be opened they shall be decided upon jointly.

ART. 5. The Chinese Government agrees that in respect of the (two) cases mentioned herein below the Japanese Government's consent shall be first obtained before action is taken:

(a) Whenever permission is granted to the subject of a third power to build a railway or to make a loan with a third power for the purpose of building a railway in South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia.

(b) Whenever a loan is to be made with a third power pledging the local taxes of South Manchuria and Eastern Inner Mongolia as security.

ART. 6. The Chinese Government agrees that if the Chinese Government employs political, financial, or military advisers or instructors in South Manchuria or Eastern Inner Mongolia the Japanese Government shall first be consulted.

ART. 7. The Chinese Government agrees that the control and management of the Kirin-Changchun Railway shall be handed over to the Japanese Government for a term of 99 years dating from the signing of this agreement.

GROUP III.

The Japanese Government and the Chinese Government, seeing that Japanese financiers and the Hanyehping Co. have close relations with each other at present, and desiring that the common interests of the two nations shall be advanced, agree to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. The two contracting parties mutually agree that when the opportune moment arrives the Hanyehping Co. shall be made a joint concern of the two nations, and they further agree that without the previous consent of Japan China shall not by her own act dispose of the rights and property of whatsoever nature of the said company nor cause the said company to dispose freely of the same.

ART. 2. The Chinese Government agrees that all mines in the neighborhood of those owned by the Hanyehping Co. shall not be permitted, without the consent of the said company, to be worked by other persons outside of the said company; and further agrees that if it is desired to carry out any undertaking which it is apprehended may directly or indirectly affect the interests of the said company the consent of the said company shall first be obtained.

GROUP IV.

The Japanese Government and the Chinese Government with the object of effectively preserving the territorial integrity of China agree to the following special article:

The Chinese Government engages not to cede or lease to a third power any harbor or bay or island along the coast of China.

GROUP V.

ARTICLE 1. The Chinese Central Government shall employ influential Japanese as advisers in political, financial, and military affairs.

ART. 2. Japanese hospitals, churches, and schools in the interior of China shall be granted the right of owning land.

ART. 3. Inasmuch as the Japanese Government and the Chinese Government have had many cases of dispute between Japanese and Chinese police to settle, cases which caused no little misunderstanding, it is for this reason necessary that the police departments of important places (in China) shall be jointly administered by Japanese and Chinese, or that the police departments of these places shall employ numerous Japanese, so that they may at the same time help to plan for the improvement of the Chinese police service.

ART. 4. China shall purchase from Japan a fixed amount of munitions of war (say 50 per cent or more of what is needed by the Chinese Government) or there shall be established in China a Sino-Japanese jointly worked arsenal. Japanese technical experts to be employed and Japanese material to be purchased.

ART. 5. China agrees to grant to Japan the right of constructing a railway connecting Wuchang with Kiukiang and Nanchang, another line between Nanchang and Hangchow, and another between Nanchang and Chaochou

ART. 6. If China needs foreign capital to work mines, build railways, and construct harbor work (including dock yard) in the Province of Fukien, Japan shall first be consulted.

ART. 7. China agrees that Japanese subjects shall have the right to propagate Buddhism in China.

SECRET RUSSO-JAPANESE TREATY, JULY 3, 1916.

ARTICLE 1. The two high contracting parties acknowledge that the vital interests of both require the safeguarding of China against the political domination by any third power entertaining hostile designs toward Russia or Japan, and therefore mutually pledge themselves, each time when circumstances demand it, to enter into frank relations based on complete mutual trust with one another with a view to taking joint measures for the prevention of the possibility of the advent of such a state of affairs (in China).

* * * * * * *

ART. 6. The present convention shall be kept in complete secrecy from everybody except the two high contracting parties.

NOTE FROM THE AMERICAN MINISTER AT PEKING TO THE CHINESE MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

PEKING, February 4, 1917.

I have the honor to advise your excellency that I have been instructed by my Government to make to you the following notification in its behalf:

This Government, in view of the recent announcement by the German Government of its intention to renew indiscriminate submarine warfare, has no alternative but to pursue the course laid down in its note to the German Government on April 18, 1916. It will therefore recall the American ambassador and his suite at Berlin and will forthwith deliver to the German ambassador in Washington passports for himself and his suite.

I am further instructed to say that the President is reluctant to believe that Germany will actually carry out the threats made against neutral commerce, but, if it is done, the President will ask from Congress authority to use the national power to protect American citizens engaged in peaceful and lawful errands on the high seas. The course taken is, in the view of the President, in entire conformity with the principles enunciated by him in his address to the Senate on January 22, and he therefore believes that it will make for the peace of the world if the other neutral powers can find it possible to take action similar to that taken by the Government of the United States.

APPENDIX C OF "THE SECRET TREATIES."

[By F. Seymour Cocks.]

DIPLOMATIC DOCUMENTS RELATING TO JAPAN.

The following diplomatic documents from the archives of the Russian foreign office have appeared in the Petrograd press. The translations were published in the Manchester Guardian on February 7 and 22, 1918. The first three relate to Japan's territorial war aims, the last three to Japan's relations with China and to the interpretation of the term "special interests" in the Japanese-American agreement (Mr. LANSING's note of Nov. 2, 1917), quoted on page 64:

I.

[From M. Krupensky, the former Russian ambassador at Tokyo. Dispatch dated February 8, 1917.]

I never omit an opportunity for representing to the minister for foreign affairs the desirability, in the interests of Japan herself, of China's intervention in the war, and only last week I had a conversation with him on the subject. To-day I again pointed out to him that the present moment was particularly favorable, in view of the position taken up by the United States and the proposal made by them to the neutral powers to follow their example, and, more particularly, in view of the recent speeches of the American minister at Peking. Viscount Motono replied that he would be the first to welcome a rupture between China and Germany, and would not hesitate to take steps in this direction at Peking if he were sure that the Chinese Government would go in that direction. So far, however, he had no such assurance, and he feared lest unsuccessful representations at Peking might do harm to the Allies. He promised me to sound the attitude of Peking without delay, and, in case of some hope of success, to propose to the cabinet to take a decision in the desired direction.

On the other hand, the minister pointed out the necessity for him, in view of the attitude of Japanese public opinion on the subject, as well as with a view to safeguard Japan's position at the future peace conference, if China should be admitted to it, of securing the support of the allied powers to the desires of Japan in respect of Shantung and the Pacific islands. These desires are for the succession to all the rights and privileges hitherto possessed by Germany in the Shantung Province and for the acquisition of the islands to the north of the Equator which are now occupied by the Japanese. Motono plainly told me that the Japanese Government would like to receive at once the promise of the Imperial (Russian) Government to support the above desires of Japan. In order to give a push to the highly important question of a break between China and Germany, I regard it as very desirable that the Japanese should be given the promise they ask—this the more as, so far as can be seen here, the relations between Great Britain and Japan have of late been such as to justify a surmise that the Japanese aspirations would not meet with any objections on the part of the London cabinet.

[Dispatch dated Mar. 1, 1917.]

The minister for foreign affairs asked me to-day whether I had received a reply from the Imperial (Russian) Government relating to Japan's desires on the question of Shantung and the Pacific islands, and told me that the Japanese Government would very much like to have at the earliest a promise from us on the subject.

III.

[Dispatch dated Mar. 21, 1917.]

I communicated to-day to the minister for foreign affairs the contents of your high excellency's telegram, and gave him a copy. Viscount Motono confined himself to the observation that he took note of my communication, and would report it to the council of ministers and the Emperor. The attitude of public opinion and the press here toward the revolution in Russia is, on the whole, sympathetic. It is regarded as a pledge of a successful prosecution of the war until complete victory has been obtained, and the end of the rule of the bureaucracy is welcomed. While paying due tribute to the Emperor's and the Grand Duke Michael Alexandrovitch's patriotic acts of abdication, public opinion here expresses the hope that the new Government and the popular representatives to be summoned would not be inclined toward extreme decisions. The same attitude toward the events in Russia could be perceived in the few general words which I heard in this connection from the minister of foreign affairs.

IV.

[Dispatch from the Russian ambassador at Tokyo, dated Oct. 16, 1917.]

In reply to my question as to the credibility of the rumors alleging that Japan is prepared to sell to the Chinese Government a considerable quantity of arms and munitions, Viscount Motono confirmed them, and added that the Peking Government had promised not to use the arms against the southerners. It was evident from the minister's words, however, that this promise possessed only the value of a formal justification of this sale, infringing as the latter does the principle of non-intervention in the internal Chinese feuds, proclaimed by Japan herself, and that the Japanese Government was in this instance deliberately assisting the Tuan-tse-shua cabinet in the hope of receiving from it in return substantial privileges. It is most likely that the Japanese are aiming principally at obtaining the privilege of rearming the entire Chinese Army, and at making China dependent in the future on Japanese arsenals and the supply of munitions from Japan. The arms to be supplied to China are estimated at 30,000,000 yen. At the same time Japan intends establishing an arsenal in China for the manufacture of war material.

V.

[Dispatch dated Oct. 22, 1917.]

Referring to Bakhmetyeff's (Russian ambassador at Washington) N 598, if the United States thinks, as it appeared to our ambassador—from conversation with Lansing—that the recognition of Japan's special position in China is of no practical consequence, such a view will inevitably lead in the future to serious misunderstandings between us and Japan. The Japanese are manifesting more and more clearly a tendency to interpret the special position of Japan in China, inter alia, in the sense that other powers must not undertake in China any political steps without previously exchanging views with Japan on the subject, a condition that would to some extent establish a Japanese control over the foreign affairs of China. On the other hand, the Japanese Government does not attach great importance to its recognition of the principle of the open door and the integrity of China, regarding it as merely a repetition of the assurances repeatedly given by it earlier to other powers and implying no new restrictions for the Japanese policy in China. It is therefore quite possible that at some future time there may arise in this connection misunderstandings between the United States and Japan. The minister of foreign affairs again confirmed to-day in conversation with me that in the negotiations by Viscount Ishii the question at issue is not some special concession to Japan in these or other parts of China, but Japan's special position in China as a whole.

VI.

[Dispatch dated Nov. 1, 1917.]

The minister for foreign affairs asked me to call on him to-day and communicated to me confidentially, but quite officially, the text of the notes transmitted in my telegram N 2, which are to be exchanged at Washington on November 2 or 3 between the American State Secretary and Viscount Ishii. A similar communication was made to-day to the British ambassador here. The French and Italian ambassadors will receive the text of the notes in a day or two, privately, for their information. The publication of the notes will probably take place on November 7; until then the minister asks the powers to keep his communication secret.

When handing me the above-mentioned text of the notes, Viscount Motono added that he had only received it in final form yesterday by wire from Washington, and since Viscount Ishii was to leave (Washington) the night after next, the signature of the notes could not have been postponed, in spite of the Japanese Government's desire to ascertain the views of the Russian Government on the subject prior to it. The minister hoped that he would not be blamed for that at Petrograd, especially as the present agreement between America and Japan could not arouse any objection on our part. Viscount Motono mentioned that when concluding (gap in the original), one of the objects was to put an end to the German intrigues intended to sow discord between Japan and the United States and to prove thereby to the Chinese that there was between the two powers a complete agreement of view with regard to China, who, therefore, must not reckon on the possibility of extracting any profit from playing off one against the other.

To my question whether he did not fear that in the future misunderstandings might arise from the different interpretations by Japan and the United States of the meaning of the terms "special position" and "special interests" of Japan in China, Viscount Motono replied by saying that (a gap in the original). Nevertheless, I gain the impression from the words of the minister that he is conscious of the possibility of misunderstandings also in the future, but is of the opinion that in such a case Japan would have better means at her disposal for carrying into effect her interpretation than the United States.

CORRESPONDENCE (IN PART) CONCLUDING THE AGREEMENT BY FRANCE AND GREAT BRITAIN TO SUPPORT JAPAN IN SHANTUNG.

FEBRUARY 16, 1917.

To the JAPANESE MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

With reference to the subject of our conversation of the 27th ultimo, His Britannic Majesty's Government accedes with pleasure to request of the Japanese Government for an assurance that they will support Japan's claims in regard to the disposal of Germany's rights in Shantung and possession of the islands north of the Equator on the occasion of the peace conference, it being understood that the Japanese Government will in the eventual peace settlement treat in the same spirit Great Britain's claim to the German islands south of the Equator.

CONYNGHAM GREENE,
His Britannic Majesty's Ambassador.

FEBRUARY 21, 1917.

To the BRITISH AMBASSADOR:

The Japanese Government is deeply appreciative of the friendly spirit in which your Government has given assurance, and happy to note it as fresh proof of the close ties that unite the two allied powers. I take pleasure in stating that the Japanese Government on its part is fully prepared to support in the same spirit the claims which may be put forward at the peace conference in regard to the German possessions in the islands south of the Equator.

Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs.

To the FRENCH AMBASSADOR:

The Imperial Japanese Government proposes to demand from Germany at the time of the peace negotiations the surrender of the territorial rights and special interests Germany possessed before the war in Shantung and the islands situated north of the Equator in the Pacific Ocean.

The Imperial Japanese Government confidently hopes the Government of the French Republic, realizing the legitimacy of these demands, will give assurance that, her case being proved, Japan may count upon its full support in this question.

Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs.

To the JAPANESE MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS:

The Government of the French Republic is disposed to give the Japanese Government its accord in regulating at the time of the peace negotiations questions vital to Japan concerning Shantung and the German islands in the Pacific north of the Equator. It also agrees to support the demands of the Imperial Japanese Government for the surrender of the rights Germany possessed before the war in this Chinese Province and these islands.

French Ambassador.

THE LANSING-ISHII AGREEMENT.

NOVEMBER 2, 1917.

To the AMBASSADOR OF JAPAN:

I have the honor to communicate herein my understanding of the agreement reached by us in our recent conversations touching the questions of mutual interest to our Governments relating to the Republic of China.

In order to silence mischievous reports that have from time to time been circulated, it is believed by us that a public announcement once more of the desires and intentions shared by our two Governments with regard to China is advisable.

The Governments of the United States and Japan recognize that territorial propinquity creates special relations between countries, and, consequently, the Government of the United States recognizes that Japan has special interests in China, particularly in the part to which her possessions are contiguous.

The territorial sovereignty of China, nevertheless, remains unimpaired and the Government of the United States has every confidence in the repeated assurances of the Imperial Japanese Government that while geographical position gives Japan such special interests they have no desire to discriminate against the trade of other nations or to disregard the commercial rights heretofore granted by China in treaties with other powers.

The Governments of the United States and Japan deny that they have any purpose to infringe in any way the independence or territorial integrity of China and they declare, furthermore, that they always adhere to the principle of the so-called "open door" or equal opportunity for commerce and industry in China.

Moreover, they mutually declare that they are opposed to the acquisition by any Government of any special rights or privileges that would affect the independence or territorial integrity of China or that would deny to the subjects or citizens of any country the full enjoyment of equal opportunity in the commerce and industry of China.

I shall be glad to have Your Excellency confirm this understanding of the agreement reached by us.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurance of my highest consideration.

(Signed) ROBERT LANSING.

NOVEMBER 2, 1917.

To the SECRETARY OF STATE:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of to-day, communicating to me your understanding of the agreement reached by us in our recent conversations touching the questions of mutual interest to our Governments relating to the Republic of China.

I am happy to be able to confirm to you, under authorization of my Government, the understanding in question set forth in the following terms:

In order to silence mischievous reports that have from time to time been circulated, it is believed by us that a public announcement once more of the desires and intentions shared by our two Governments with regard to China is advisable.

The Governments of Japan and the United States recognize that territorial propinquity creates special relations between countries, and, consequently, the Government of the United States recognizes that Japan has special interests in China, particularly in the part to which her possessions are contiguous.

The territorial sovereignty of China, nevertheless, remains unimpaired and the Government of the United States has every confidence in the repeated assurances of the Imperial Japanese Government that while geographical position gives Japan such special interests they have no desire to discriminate against the trade of other nations or to disregard the commercial rights heretofore granted by China in treaties with other powers.

The Governments of Japan and the United States deny that they have any purpose to infringe in any way the independence or territorial integrity of China and they declare, furthermore, that they always adhere to the principle of the so-called "open door" or equal opportunity for commerce and industry in China.

Moreover, they mutually declare that they are opposed to the acquisition by any Government of any special rights or privileges that would affect the independence or territorial integrity of China or that would deny to the subjects or citizens of any country the full enjoyment of equal opportunity in the commerce and industry of China.

I take this opportunity to convey to you, sir, the assurances of my highest consideration.

(Signed) K. ISHII,
Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of Japan on Special Mission.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

During the delivery of Mr. MCCORMICK's speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will proceed.

After the conclusion of Mr. MCCORMICK's speech,

Mr. PITTMAN and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). The Senator from Nevada.

EFFECT OF TREATY RESERVATIONS.

Mr. PITTMAN addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the subject under discussion by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is one of very great importance. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Harding	McKellar	Smoot
Borah	Harris	McNary	Spencer
Calder	Henderson	Nelson	Stanley
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	New	Sterling
Colt	Johnson, Calif.	Nugent	Swanson
Curtis	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Thomas
Dial	Kendrick	Owen	Townsend
Elkins	King	Page	Trammell
Fall	Knox	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Fletcher	La Follette	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
France	Lenroot	Reed	Watson
Gerry	Lodge	Sheppard	Williams
Hale	McCormick	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], and the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are detained on official business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, the Chair announces that a quorum is present. The Senator from Nevada will proceed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I offered this morning a resolution providing for reservations in a separate resolution. I desire to discuss that resolution briefly.

The conference held yesterday at the White House between the President of the United States and the Foreign Relations Committee, upon the intimation of the President that he would be pleased to hold such conference, has, in my opinion, assured the early ratification of the treaty. The meeting was marked by a splendid spirit of sincere endeavor to arrive at definite conclusions. The courtesy and frankness which characterized the interview induced a most calm and complete consideration of the law and the facts bearing upon the involved questions now under consideration by the Senate. The atmosphere has been clarified. Many obstacles have been removed. The issues have been limited.

The President has suggested a plan that should make it easily possible for all those who desire a league of nations to join their efforts and ratify the treaty. He has met the reservationist more than half way. Whilst personally satisfied that the terms of the treaty are not subject to misconstruction, in his intense desire for harmony and the early accomplishment of peace he has given his approval of the substance of the reservations urged by Senator McCUMBER and Senator KELLOGG, and other reservationist supporters of the league of nations. Let me be careful lest I misrepresent the President's position. Whilst he has given his approval of such reservations he is opposed to the plan of inserting these reservations in the resolution of ratification. He favors the adoption by the Senate of a separate and contemporaneous resolution, setting forth the construction and interpretation of the treaty as understood by our Government. He contends that the same result will be accomplished, as far as the protection of our Government is concerned, by either plan. He holds, however, that if the reservations are included in the resolution of ratification that it necessitates the return of the treaty for further consideration and approval, not only by all of our friends who are parties to the treaty but by Germany, while a separate resolution, not being a part of the treaty, would not require further consideration by the other parties thereto or their consent or approval. Let me quote the President's own language in this behalf. While article 1 of the covenant of the league of nations, dealing with the right of a member to withdraw upon two years' notice, was under discussion, the following colloquy took place between the President and Senator BORAH:

Senator BORAH. Then if a country should give notice of withdrawal it would be the sole judge of whether or not it had fulfilled its international obligations—its covenants to the league?

The PRESIDENT. That is as I understand it. The only restraining influence would be the public opinion of the world.

Thereupon Senator McCUMBER propounded to the President the following inquiry:

Would there be any objection, then, to a reservation declaring that to be the understanding of the force of this section?

To which the President replied:

Senator, as I indicated at the opening of our conference, this is my judgment about that. Only we can interpret a moral obligation. The legal obligation can be enforced by such machinery as there is to enforce it. We are therefore at liberty to interpret the sense in which we undertake a moral obligation. What I feel very earnestly is that it would be a mistake to embody that interpretation in the resolution of ratification, because then it would be necessary for other Governments to act upon it.

Again, later in the interview, when Senator McCUMBER was urging the President's approval of a reservation in the resolution of ratification interpreting article 10 as the President understands it, the President replied:

We differ, Senator, only as to the form of action. I think it would be a very serious practical mistake to put it in the resolution of ratification, but I do hope that we are at liberty, contemporaneously with our acceptance of the treaty, to interpret our moral obligation under that article.

So that there might not be any doubt with regard to the President's position I then asked him this question:

Mr. President, I understand that under the former method, in your opinion, it would have to go back to Germany and the other countries, while under the latter method it would not be required to go back for ratification.

To which the President replied:

Yes, sir; that is my judgment.

So the position of the President is definite in this regard.

Let us frankly consider what are the merits and demerits of the respective plans.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, would the Senator prefer to have questions submitted at the close of his remarks?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think probably it would be better. My address will take only about 30 minutes, and then I shall be very glad to answer any questions.

Mr. BORAH. I simply wanted to get a definite idea of the Senator's position, and I will be glad to wait until he concludes.

Mr. PITTMAN. Very well.

The resolution of ratification admittedly becomes a part of the treaty. It is as much a part of the treaty as the signature of the President. It is a part of the execution of the treaty. Under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States the language of the resolution of ratification is construed with the body of the treaty.

If there are any reservations or qualifications or interpretative clauses in the resolution of ratification, then these things must be taken into consideration in construing the meaning of the treaty. The entire treaty may be changed by reservations, qualifications, or interpretations included therein; at least, I have so construed the plain language of the Supreme Court of the United States. I take it that this will not be disputed by lawyers.

Senator KELLOGG, one of the able proponents of reservations in the resolution of ratification, in his speech in the Senate on August 7, in response to a question which I propounded to him, said:

Certainly; if the reservation I propose as to domestic questions changes the substance of the contract, it must be accepted by the other parties either by ratification, exchange of notes, or in some other manner.

Every party to the treaty has the right to determine for itself whether or not language added to the treaty changes the substance of the contract. How could it make this determination unless the treaty with the reservations were resubmitted to it for consideration and determination?

This colloquy between the President and Senator McCUMBER upon this subject gives a very clear exposition of what I am attempting to express. It is as follows:

Senator McCUMBER. If they all recognized at the time that this was the understanding and the construction that should be given to that portion of the treaty, would it be necessary for them to act on it again?

The PRESIDENT. I think it would, Senator.

Senator McCUMBER. Could they not accept it merely by acquiescence?

The PRESIDENT. My experience as a lawyer was not very long; but that experience would teach me that the language of a contract is always part of the debatable matter, and I can testify that in our discussions in the commission on the league of nations we did not discuss ideas half as much as we discussed phraseologies.

At this point Mr. WALSH of Montana raised the question of a quorum and the roll was called.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, at the time I was interrupted I was discussing the necessity of the return of the treaty to the signatory powers in the event that there were any reservations included in the resolution of ratification.

It is true that the President stated that he was confident from the discussions that took place at the time of the adoption of the covenant of the league of nations that all of the framers of the covenant place upon it the same construction that he does; but the treaty, if reservations be contained in the resolution of ratification, must go back to Germany, and Germany has expressed no opinion upon the construction to be given to the covenant of the league of nations. We do not know whether she would accept our construction or not. We do know that Germany is longing for an opportunity to attach to the treaty hundreds of reservations which she urged upon the peace conference and which were denied.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will it interrupt the Senator if I ask him a question now?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think not.

Mr. THOMAS. The report of the proceedings at the White House yesterday shows a question asked the President by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], the purport of the question being, inasmuch as Germany is not a member of the league, and probably will not be for some time, whether it was necessary for her to consider amendments or reservations to the league part of the treaty. Although perhaps I am anticipating the Senator in the matter just referred to, I wish to inquire whether the President answered that the subject had not occurred to him, but that he agreed with the Senator from New Mexico that such amendments or reservations need not be submitted to Germany?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will state that the report that the President agreed with any such suggestion is not founded on fact, and I will now read from the record of the conference on yesterday to prove that my statement is true.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not quite understand the Senator from Colorado. Did he assert that the newspaper report indicated that the President agreed with the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we can not hear on this side.

Mr. THOMAS. The Star of yesterday and the Post of this morning so stated.

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I did not rise to interrupt the Senator from Nevada, but I could not hear the colloquy, and I was interested to know what was being said.

Mr. PITTMAN. A part of the question of the Senator from New Mexico, to which the Senator has referred, reads as follows, referring to the covenant, or rather the treaty, with reservations upon it:

It would not be submitted to her—

at all now, because she is not a member of the league? You catch the point?

The PRESIDENT. Yes. I differ with you there, Senator. One of the reasons for putting the league in the treaty was that Germany was not going to be admitted to the league immediately, and we felt that it was very necessary that we should get her acknowledgment, acceptance of the league as an international authority, partly because we were excluding her, so that she would thereafter have no ground for questioning such authority as the league might exercise under its covenant.

Senator FALL. Precisely.

The PRESIDENT. Therefore I think it would be necessary for her to acquiesce in a league the powers of which were differently construed.

But let us go on further, so that we may be entirely fair with the Senator from New Mexico. The Senator from New Mexico went on further and said:

Senator FALL. Well, Mr. President, of course, it is not my purpose to enter into an argument, but we are here for information. There are provisions for the amendment of the articles. Germany is out of the league. Any amendment proposed by the other members of the league prior to her coming into the league would not be submitted to her, would it, she not being a member?

The PRESIDENT. I will admit that that point had not occurred to me. No; she would not.

Senator FALL. Then, so far as we are concerned, we could make a recommendation in the nature of an amendment.

Senator PITTMAN. She has already agreed by this treaty that she has signed that the members may amend it.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. President, probably the confusion in the minds of some of the newspapers comes from misconstruing the word "members." Germany, in signing the treaty, agreed that the members of the league might amend the league covenant. How did she agree to it? Not in any specific language, not in any specific terms, but by signing the treaty containing the covenant, and the covenant of the league itself provides how it may be amended. Germany was forced in signing the treaty, as the President has stated, to indorse the league of nations. In indorsing the league of nations it is true that she recognized that the covenant of the league of nations may be changed by the members of the league, not changed by all those governments who have signed the treaty, but changed by the members of the league after it is created. How changed? Changed in accordance with the provision of the covenant itself, which provides how it may be amended. The impression has gotten out from Senator FALL's question that Germany in some way in signing the treaty admitted that other nations signing the treaty of peace might change it in any way at any time. There is absolutely no such clause in the treaty nor in the covenant of the league of nations. There is nothing there except the adoption of the covenant. Germany, in signing the treaty, agreed to article 26, which is as follows:

Amendments to this covenant will take effect when ratified by the members of the league whose representatives compose the council and by a majority of the members of the league whose representatives compose the assembly.

No such amendment shall bind any member of the league which signifies its dissent therefrom, but in that case it shall cease to be a member of the league.

The President did not agree with the Senator from New Mexico, and expressly stated that he did not.

Mr. FALL. I will not interrupt the Senator from Nevada at this time, but I shall certainly not allow that statement to go unchallenged at this or any other time.

Mr. PITTMAN. Very well. I have read the statement from the record upon which I base my assertion.

Mr. FALL. I will state to the Senator, if he does not care to read any further at this time, that I will read a little further.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it was asserted by the Senator, as I understand it from this record, which I have just read, and, of course, if I misstate his position in any way I hope the Senator from New Mexico will correct me instantly, that Germany is not interested in any change that we make in the covenant of the league of nations, because she is not to be a member of the league of nations upon its organization. That is the way I understand the Senator.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. The Senator used the expression that he hoped I would correct him instantly, but as I have already stated, I do not care to interrupt the Senator in the course of his argument. I shall undertake to point out later where he is mistaken. Of course if he prefers it, I will do so now.

Mr. PITTMAN. I want to get this correct. The Senator from New Mexico contends and did contend, I think, at the conference that the treaty, if changed by us with reference to the league of nations, did not have to go back to Germany because Germany is not, upon the organization, to become a member of the league and no definite time is set when she shall become a league member. I think I have possibly covered it in that way.

To make that position sound you have got to hold that a government which is a party to a treaty is not interested in any commission of which it is not a member. In other words, you have to hold that the only possible interest that Germany could have in the league of nations would be as a member, that Germany would have no interest in what the league of nations did to her so long as she was not a member of it. As a matter of fact, the constitution and operation of the league of nations is of vital importance to Germany. Why? Because in the first place Germany surrenders in trust to the council of the league of nations the Saar Basin. And under that trust which she surrenders to the council of the league of nations she depends upon the league of nations to protect her subjects in that basin for 15 years and until a plebiscite is had and it is then determined whether that district shall be under German sovereignty or under French sovereignty.

Mr. OWEN. And also in 60 other cases.

Mr. PITTMAN. And, as suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma, there are 60 other cases in which the league of nations has a direct and positive bearing upon the welfare of the German Government. We will take, for instance, Germany's relation to Austria. Article 80 reads:

Germany acknowledges and will respect strictly the independence of Austria within the frontiers which may be fixed in a treaty between that State and the Principal Allied and Associated Powers; she agrees that this independence shall be inalienable, except with the consent of the council of the league of nations.

We turn to another section and we find that absolute control over the armament of Germany is granted to the league of nations. The control of the armament of no other country is granted to the league of nations. Is it possible that in these considerations Germany can be said to have no interest in a change in the covenant of the league of nations? Why, as was said by the Senator from Oklahoma, Germany has signed a treaty containing in its body the covenant of the league of nations; it has signed a treaty granting to that league of nations tremendous and frequently arbitrary power over the welfare of the present German subjects. Is it possible that the covenant in the form in which it was presented was not of interest to Germany? Is it possible that Germany is not interested in any changes that may be made in the covenant of the league of nations that so directly affects her interests? I think to argue that is arguing an absurdity. The fact remains that the covenant of the league of nations is a part of the treaty that Germany has signed and which we are asked to ratify. It is indivisible, so far as Germany is concerned. She has ratified it; she is interested in every line of that treaty. If a change made in the treaty in the process of ratification will send it back to France and to England and to Italy and to Japan, because it constitutes a change in the treaty with those Governments which must be approved, then the same reasoning forces the treaty back to Germany. I can not conceive how anyone can draw any different conclusion.

Germany was then forced, under an armistice and under war conditions, to accept the treaty as it was; Germany has signed the treaty which was forced upon her; but if it is now returned to her for approval of changes, then, under international law, she has the same right with regard to reservations as have we. It is conclusively evident that the inclusion of reservations in the resolution of ratification would long delay peace, and it might result in the abandonment of the league of nations.

I am aware that this latter result would not be displeasing to some of the Senators here. If, then, the interest of our Government, that some believe is jeopardized by indefinite articles in the covenant, can be protected in a resolution of interpretation which will not bring about results that must accrue if placed in the resolution of ratification, there will be no hesitation, in my opinion, upon the part of two-thirds of the United States Senate. I believe that such a resolution will accomplish such a result.

Let us see what may be the effectiveness of interpretative clauses in a separate resolution as to establishing a construction desired by the United States as to articles 1 and 10.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask a question of the Senator there, simply in order that I may follow him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PITTMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. BORAH. I have not clearly in my mind whether the Senator expects this interpretative resolution to be formally adopted by the other nations.

Mr. PITTMAN. I expect it to be adopted by Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Brazil, and, probably, by all of the nations having members upon the council of the league of nations.

Mr. BORAH. Then the Senator does not contend that the interpretative resolution would amount to anything unless these powers did adopt it?

Mr. PITTMAN. I can not answer that question without making an explanation. It would have no force or effect as to any question in the decision of which other nations had a right to take part unless they adopted it. It would, however, have the effect of exonerating us from any cause of complaint with regard to questions that under the league of nations are within the sole judgment and determination of this country.

Therefore, there being two characters of obligations, it simplifies matters to include the interpretation of both in the resolution to be adopted by Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan.

Mr. BORAH. May I be permitted to again interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada further yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, the Senator's position is that resolutions of the character referred to would not be binding upon any nation that did not adopt them; that they would be binding, as I understand, only upon ourselves; that is to say, they would be a contemporaneous construction which would be helpful in the future when we ourselves come to construe any clause which had reference solely to our individual action; but if the other nations are to be bound by our construction, they must, as I understand the Senator, in some form accept our construction.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the other nations are to be legally bound by our construction, then they must approve it. If, however, our construction is the final construction with regard to which they have no power of interference, then, if they do not approve it, it serves solely as a notice to them, carrying with it whatever moral force a notice of intended construction and intended future action would have.

I contend that if the obligation upon our part is purely a moral obligation, which we have a right to determine for ourselves without interference from the council or any other body, or without any authority on their part, then our resolution with regard to such questions not only serves as notice to them but estops them afterwards from complaining with regard to the commission of any act that we have notified them we will perform. But this discussion is academic, because these nations will undoubtedly adopt a similar resolution of interpretation. If they are unwilling, however, to adopt such interpretations in a separate resolution, then, of course, they would refuse to approve and ratify the treaty with such interpretations made a part of the treaty by being placed in the resolution of ratification. We may quickly ascertain the attitude of these nations toward these interpretations by passing the resolution now.

The President, in his address to the conference on yesterday, set forth not only his understanding of the construction to be given to these articles, but the construction, as he understands it, that was intended by the other governments who participated in the framing of the covenant of the league of nations. He said:

> The right of any sovereign state to withdraw had been taken for granted, but no objection was made to making it explicit. Indeed, so soon as the views expressed at the White House conference were laid before the commission it was at once conceded that it was best not to leave the answer to so important a question to inference. No proposal was made to set up any tribunal to pass judgment upon the question whether a withdrawing nation had in fact fulfilled "all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant." It was recognized that that question must be left to be resolved by the conscience of the nation proposing to withdraw; and I must say that it did not seem to me worth while to propose that the article be made more explicit, because I knew that the United States would never itself propose to withdraw from the league if its conscience was not entirely clear as to the fulfillment of all its international obligations. It has never failed to fulfill them and never will.
> Article 10 is in no respect of doubtful meaning when read in the light of the covenant as a whole. The council of the league can only "advise upon" the means by which the obligations of that great article are to be given effect to. Unless the United States is a party to the policy or action in question, her own affirmative vote in the council is necessary before any advice can be given, for a unanimous vote of the council is required. If she is a party, the trouble is hers anyhow. And the unanimous vote of the council is only advice in any case. Each government is free to reject it if it pleases.
> Nothing could have been made more clear to the conference than the right of our Congress under our Constitution to exercise its independent judgment in all matters of peace and war. No attempt was made to question or limit that right. The United States will, indeed, undertake under article 10 to "respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league," and that engagement constitutes a very grave and solemn moral obligation. But it is a moral, not a legal, obligation, and leaves our Congress absolutely free to put its own interpretation upon it in all cases that call for action. It is binding in conscience only, not in law.

The President contends that these articles place upon the United States no legal obligation; that the only obligation that arises is a moral obligation. At the conference he very clearly stated his understanding of the distinction between a legal and a moral obligation in these words:

> When I speak of a legal obligation, I mean one that specifically binds you to do a particular thing under certain sanctions. That is a legal obligation. Now, a moral obligation is, of course, superior to a legal obligation, and, if I may say so, has a greater binding force. Only there always remains in the moral obligation the right to exercise one's judgment as to whether it is indeed incumbent upon one in those circumstances to do that thing. In every moral obligation there is an element of judgment; in a legal obligation there is no element of judgment.

But it is contended that other governments might become offended should the United States, in the exercise of its judgment with regard to its moral obligations, withdraw from the league when other governments might not consider that it had fulfilled its obligations. Certainly there would be no grounds for such offense, if all of these governments were notified in advance of our Government entering into the pact, as to the manner in which it would determine its own moral obligations. If our Government now says that it construes article 1 to permit it to withdraw upon two years' notice without regard to the views of other nations as to our obligations under the covenant, then there can be no surprise or cause for complaint when such action be taken.

Exactly the same situation exists with regard to article 10. If we now notify the other parties to the treaty that we will not hold ourselves morally bound by any advice or determination of the council or the assembly of the league of nations, or any other government, then other governments will understand, and will deal with us under this understanding, and there will be no cause for future complaint.

We do not have to ask the other nations to agree to permit us to use our own judgment as to our moral obligations. A moral obligation is a matter of individual judgment. We simply give the other nations notice, so that they may not be surprised and may have no grounds for misunderstanding or complaint. This may all be accomplished in a resolution of the Senate, for which no approval or ratification is required by any other nation.

But it may be contended that the articles of the covenant dealing with domestic affairs and the Monroe doctrine involve legal obligations that must be determined by the council or the assembly, and that no interpretation placed upon such articles by us would have any binding force or effect unless agreed to by the other parties to the treaty. Even if such contention is well founded, I still believe that it would be much simpler to insure our construction of the articles through a separate resolution than through reservations in the resolution of ratification of the treaty.

The Senate could pass in a separate resolution such reservations as were proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] in his speech delivered in the Senate on the 7th of August. This resolution could then be presented to the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Brazil, and, possibly, the other nations who will be represented upon the council of the league of nations for their consideration and with the request that each of them, through their proper bodies, adopt the identical resolution or a resolution of similar import.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose we pass an interpretative resolution and then proceed to the ratification of the treaty, and the other nations do not see fit to pass the resolution or to accept it, we would be in the same position so far as binding them is concerned, I take it, as though we had not passed it at all.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not gather exactly what the Senator means.

Mr. BORAH. As I understood the Senator a moment ago, in order that other nations may be bound by the construction which we place upon these particular articles it will be necessary for them to adopt the resolution or accede to it. Now, suppose they do not do so—it is a separate instrument—suppose they do not act upon it at all, or suppose only one acts upon where will that leave the United States? The covenant, then, will have no construction except a construction which, I take it from the Senator's argument, will simply be helpful to us in the future as a contemporaneous construction by the body which ratified the treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the other Governments, or a sufficient number of them who will be represented upon the council of the league of nations, decline to pass a resolution of this purport, then they would not be bound, of course, by our interpretation under the resolution with regard to any matters over which they now have jurisdiction. I have always contended that and am not attempting to change my position. But in saying that, I am compelled to repeat that, so far as article 1 is concerned, relating to the right of withdrawal, and so far as article 10 is concerned, which contains our promise to protect other nations members of the league against external aggression against their territorial integrity, I still think the resolution would be just as effective whether it were adopted by the other countries or not, because they have nothing to do with our moral obligations. There is hardly any doubt, however, that the other controlling nations, consisting of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, would each pass a separate resolution pledging its Government to the same interpretation. But if they would not approve of such interpretations in a separate resolution, they certainly would not approve of such interpretations when made a part of the treaty by being included in the resolution of ratification. By passing the separate resolution now we may immediately ascertain the position of these other countries. If we adopt the interpretations as a part of the treaty in the resolution of ratification we may not know what position these countries are going to take for several months. Of course, in addition to this last objection, through the inclusion of the interpretations in the resolution of ratification, is the further objection that under this latter method it would cause the return of the treaty also to Germany for Germany's approval of the reservations.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I have understood the position of the supporters of the league, article 10 is the very heart of the covenant, and every nation is deeply interested in that article, for the reason that upon it the stability of the whole structure rests. For instance, England and France are so completely interested that they want it supported by a special alliance which covers the same principle. Could it be said, if we pass an interpretative resolution to the effect that we would not regard article 10 as binding upon us except under certain specified conditions, that they would not be interested in that construction? I think if they are interested in any part of the league at all they are interested in article 10, and certainly every nation is interested in article 1, because if every nation can unconditionally withdraw, can fix its own conditions, and, by an interpretative resolution, relieve itself of any moral obligation to remain in the league, the interest which all nations feel in the covenant as a whole is centered right there, because that would destroy the entire structure.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is not any doubt but that it is the heart of the covenant—at least, as far as I am concerned it is the heart of the covenant—and I think it is of interest to all countries; but there is quite a distinction as to whether a country is interested in an article or whether it has the power of construing the obligations of another country under that article. The article does not provide any machinery for the determination or the enforcement of the obligations that may arise thereunder.

Mr. BORAH. And that obligation is specific and direct. The only uncertainty arises out of the method of doing it.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; the Senator is in error, and he is very rarely in error, and I think he will find out in a minute that he would not state it that way. It is not only in the method, but it is in the determination of the basic fact as to when the cause arises—that is, when is there an external aggression against the integrity of the territory?

Mr. BORAH. Of course the fact of an external aggression, as a fact, might be a subject of dispute; but the contract itself is that when that fact is established our obligation is specific and direct, that we will protect.

In the very able presentation of this matter by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] a few days ago—and we all pay tribute to the Senator's legal ability—he stated, as I recall, that the first clause of article 10, to wit, guaranteeing the territorial integrity and political independence of the members of the league as against external aggression, was a legal obligation, specific and direct; that the question of how it should be carried out was a matter of honor, a moral obligation, concerning which we could select or choose our way, but that the fact that we had to perform the obligation under the first section did not admit of debate; that it had to be met as there written in the bond.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the Senator from Idaho agree with the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BORAH. I did agree at that time.

Mr. PITTMAN. Does the Senator agree now?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I agree now.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then, if that is the case—if there is only a moral obligation, or if it is left to the judgment of this country as to what methods it shall utilize in going to the assistance of another country—then there is not any danger that we may be forced by the council or anyone else into using our armies or our navies.

Mr. BORAH. I have never contended at any time, Mr. President, that you could take away from Congress the constitutional right to declare war. I have not entertained that view at any time, and do not now; but, as I understood the argument of the Senator from Montana—and I stated at the time that I agreed with him, and I have had no reason to disagree since—he produced a number of instances in which we had guaranteed the territorial integrity of certain countries, Panama and New Granada, and so forth, and then cited decisions which showed that that was a legal, binding obligation, and that we had a right to make this a binding obligation, and that it was a contractual, legal obligation—that is, the guaranteeing of the territorial integrity. Then, secondly, as to the method in which we should do it—whether we should send 100,000 or 500,000 men, or whether we should blockade, or exert economic pressure—that would be a matter about which we could exercise our discretion; but we could not exercise our discretion as to the fact of guaranteeing the integrity in case it was assailed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not consider it exceedingly material as to whether it is called a legal or a moral obligation by different Senators; and I will state that it is a very difficult proposition for any lawyer to draw a clear distinction between the moral and the legal obligation. I use these designations to describe the distinction I am making. Nevertheless, the section very plainly leaves it to our own judgment to determine whether or not a cause arises; and after it leaves it to our own individual judgment as to whether the cause arises, it again leaves it to our own individual judgment as to the method in which we shall fulfill any obligation that we may determine to exist.

I want to say to the Senator that I would consider that contract very hard of enforcement in a court of law by reason of indefiniteness.

If I went into a court of law to enforce a contract written in any such way, I would not know how to prove my facts to substantiate the agreement. In other words, it does not carry the essentials of a contract. It is not a distinct, definite understanding. It is nothing on earth but a moral obligation undertaken by each of the governments which say that "when we believe that this aggression is being committed against the territorial integrity of a country, we will come to its aid, but we will not say how we are coming to its aid, but we are coming to its aid in a way that our judgment indicates."

There is not a nation that is a member of this league that can complain if four years or one year from now a cause arises and our Government then says that the case does not in our judgment constitute an external aggression against the territory or political independence of the country involved. Every other member of the league may say "We think it is," but they have no ground of complaint against us if we say we do not believe it. Why? Because they have not provided any means of determining, except the conscience of each government, and they have intended it in that way. That is the way they have left it. It is the same way with article 1. It is the same way with regard to withdrawal. They have not provided any method of determination in the matter. You could not take it into a court of law and find any method or means by which the obligations could be determined and enforced. To the conscience of the party on whom rested the alleged obligations must be left the determination. That is what I mean by the statement that it is not a legal question that we must submit to their approval. We state that when the time arrives we will determine for ourselves as to whether or not there has been an aggression committed; we will determine for ourselves what method we shall utilize; and when we do that there is no ground of complaint throughout the world. We state that when we give the two years' notice we will leave the league, and if the question of whether or not we have satisfied our obligations shall arise, we will determine that question for ourselves.

There will be no ground of complaint, because there is no provision to-day in the treaty for anyone else to determine any of those questions. A contract must be definite and certain and subject to interpretation if you are going to try to put it on the purely legal ground.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think if I had a contract with my neighbor to the effect that I would protect a third neighbor's house against attack, there would come a time when that contract would become a legal, binding obligation. There would come a time when my discretion would no longer be permitted to have play. For instance, if the house were actually under assailment, I could not any longer contend that the contract was unenforceable for the reason that my judgment as yet was not convinced. When Germany got into France——

Mr. PITTMAN. Just let me answer that, if the Senator pleases. Illustration makes my distinction clearer. In the case referred to the obligation would be legal because there would be courts to determine and enforce such obligations. There are no courts or instrumentalities to determine and enforce the obligations either under article 1 or article 10.

Mr. BORAH. Just to follow out my illustration——

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator is giving two illustrations.

Mr. BORAH. When the German Army actually invaded France and the fighting was actually going on upon the soil of France, if article 10 of this covenant had been in existence it seems to me we would not have had any discretion left. We would have had to move when that fact appeared.

Mr. PITTMAN. It would have been submitted to the Congress of the United States, and I think the Congress of the United States would have said that we should move.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think so, too.

Mr. PITTMAN. And it would have been a godsend to the world if we had moved then. Without this league of nations we could not move any more than we could move in the past. That is one of the things we want it for.

Mr. BORAH. I agree with both the argument and the appeal; but I think the Senator and I agree, then, that when that kind of a condition of affairs has been submitted to Congress, Congress would have had no discretion in the matter at all if it was going to carry out its contract.

Mr. PITTMAN. But Congress is bound to have discretion if Congress votes.

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. PITTMAN. And Congress would have to vote, unless the Senator means to say that Congress is not a body capable of having discretion.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator and I have been here too long to contend that Congress is not capable of discretion; but the Congress would have no discretion in that condition of affairs. It could not say to the world, "We do not believe that the territorial integrity of France has been assailed."

Mr. PITTMAN. It could say it, though not in that particular case; but if it had been different Congress could have said differently.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The matter in controversy here can be very well illustrated by a case put by a correspondent of mine in a letter. Of course the Senator puts a case in relation to which there can be no doubt. He says: "When Germany actually invaded France, undoubtedly our obligation would arise, and we could not escape it. Congress, as said by the Senator from Nevada, undoubtedly would make the necessary declaration of war." But my correspondent says to me: "Suppose that Mexico should make war upon Canada. Would we not be obliged to go to the aid of Canada in order to protect her against the invasion of Mexico?"

The very answer is that if Mexico declared war on Canada and prepared to establish an armada to go up through the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic Ocean and the Gulf of St. Lawrence to make war upon Canada, the Government of the United States would probably say, "Why, that does not call for any intervention on our part. The British Navy will take care of their little armada all right enough. It is not necessary for us to declare war on Mexico in fulfillment of our obligation to preserve and protect the integrity of all nations."

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the Senator from Montana, he agrees with the Senator from Idaho and disagrees with his correspondent?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not at all; not at all. I perfectly agree with the correspondent, but I insist that we are obligated, it is true, to preserve and protect the integrity of Canada; but when the question arises: "What shall we do? Shall we engage in war with Mexico? Shall we send a fleet to intercept theirs?"—when that question arises, the Congress of the United States may very properly say, "Why, there is no occasion to do that. We do not violate our obligation at all by not doing that. The conditions do not call for any action whatever upon our part, and nobody can complain because we do not." In all reasonable probability Great Britain would never make any suggestion that we ought to come to her aid. She would say, "Thank you; we will take care of the situation ourselves."

Mr. BORAH. Oh, I understand that situation; but I remember the time when Great Britain's representatives stood in this Chamber and begged for assistance.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I remember it perfectly well; and if the territory of Great Britain should ever be assailed by any other nation with any reasonable probability whatever that any progress was to be made, it would then undoubtedly be the duty of Congress to declare war against the invader; but the question as to whether the occasion calls for action upon the part of this Government is to be determined in every instance by Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely so; but conditions very readily present themselves to the mind where there is no discretion left to Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why, that undoubtedly could be the case.

Mr. BORAH. Then the Senator and I have no controversy.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If Great Britain or France, for instance, should come over to this continent and actually land an army upon the soil of Mexico or upon the soil of Brazil, there is not any doubt as to what our duty would be. Does the Senator doubt that Congress would discharge its obligation by declaring war?

Mr. BORAH. I have not any doubt about it at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Neither have I.

Mr. BORAH. And I have not any doubt that in discharging that duty it would merely perfunctorily cast its vote, because of the fact that you can not actually take away the power of Congress to do so; but Congress would have no discretion about it. It would be compelled to act if it was going to carry out its contract.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why, Mr. President, if the conditions were such as to take away from Congress any discretion to do anything more than the one thing, of course practically there would be no discretion.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho would seem to indicate that there is no chance for a difference of opinion as to whether a thing is external aggression or not.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not.

Mr. PITTMAN. For instance, we have troops chasing into Mexico to-day after bandits. There might be a difference of opinion as to whether or not that is external aggression. The Mexicans might say that that is external aggression, because we are entering their territory. The United States says: "It is not external aggression, because we are chasing bandits on a hot trail." Nevertheless, we are in the country. That same condition might arise in Europe. Some nation might have another army within its borders, and it might call out with its hands up and say: "They are guilty of external aggression against our territory," and the country whose army entered that territory might say, as we are saying to-day: "We are following a hot trail after bandits, and we intend to come out"; and then there would be a question before our Congress as to whether or not that was external aggression. Some of the Senators would vote that it was a case of external aggression, and others of them would vote that it was not a case of external aggression.

Mr. BORAH. I can readily understand that fact.

Mr. PITTMAN. And that being the case, we would assume that the Senators on that side, at least, would use discretion.

Mr. BORAH. I hope so; and I hope they will use it in this particular case.

Of course, you can easily imagine cases like the one just mentioned by the able Senator from Montana and the able Senator from Nevada, where there would be a subject for debate as to what the facts disclosed and whether or not there was external aggression. I agree to that. Then the discretion of the Congress would have full play and it could either reject or support with honor. But what I am contending is that there are just as likely to be cases where there is no discretion left at all. We must act perfunctorily and comply with the obligation of the contract which we have made.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. FALL. In the case which the Senator suggested, that there was a difference between Mexico and the United States of America as to whether the Eighth Cavalry of the United States Army being now in Mexico was an act of external aggression, the basis of such difference of opinion would be for the league to determine if those articles were enforced?

Mr. PITTMAN. The Congress of the United States, the Senate of the United States.

Mr. FALL. Then what is the purpose of your league, when you are holding out to the people of the United States that it is to take possession of and to decide such questions as will prevent war between two nations?

Mr. PITTMAN. Because I think the Congress of the United States would be perfectly patriotic and would use great discretion in protecting other nations where they deserve it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have been listening with very great interest, but I am yet unable to understand what the Senator from Nevada is attempting to do with reference to illustrating or expounding or laying down any rule or definition or differentiation as to a legal and a moral obligation under international law, whether it is the unwritten international law, the customary rule among nations, or whether it is written into a treaty. What is the difference between the legality or the force of a moral obligation, whether written in a treaty prescribing even a penalty for a violation of it, or whether simply acknowledged as a rule of customary international law observed and enforced among all the civilized nations as ordinary rules of international law are, and not providing a penalty for its violation? What is the distinction?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have really gone over the distinction four or five times and tried to make it clear.

Mr. FALL. So has the Supreme Court of the United States, and it has never found any.

Mr. PITTMAN. I can see now why the Senator does not get my answer. He will not let me finish. I was going on to explain, and I have tried several times to explain. Naturally it broadens a little bit as we go, with other Senators desiring to ask questions, and it has broadened; but nevertheless, if there is an article in the covenant under which we can do what we please, then we do not have to ask any consent about anything we will do under the article. We can do anything we please under it, because it is left to our judgment. But, mind you, there may be a difference of opinion between nations as to whether we should listen to their advice or take our own advice; and if we did not listen to their advice when trouble arose they might become offended; so that by resolution we simply say to them under this article we can do what we please, and we warn you ahead of time that that is what we are going to do.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I am just as much at sea now as I was before the explanation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Henry Ward Beecher told a story once which would explain the situation, but I have not the time now to tell it.

Mr. FALL. Possibly it may be that I could impress the Senator with the difference as I see it. As I see the matter, it is a difference without a distinction which he attempts to draw from it, and another distinction with a very great deal of difference which he sedulously avoids, or else he does not see it, in my judgment. The French treaty has been referred to here. If you will exclude the article with reference to the league of nations from the proposed French and English treaty, based upon the question as to whether it shall be a treaty or not, and treat the French treaty by itself, as one within our power to enter into, I unhesitatingly say that it is within the constitutional power of the Senate of the United States to ratify it, and I answer exactly as the Senator has been attempting to explain to the Senate, that the question, then, as to whether the act of aggression spoken of in the treaty and against which we propose to defend France, is clearly one for the Congress of the United States to define, first, whether there is such an act of aggression as they have agreed to repel, and, second, that it is within the discretion of the Congress of the United States as to what method or by what means she will proceed to carry out her obligation to defend France. As to the French treaty, there is no question in my mind of these two propositions. As to article 11 and article 10 there is all the distinction imaginable and which, in my judgment, the Senator is laboring to make as between a moral obligation and a legal obligation. In article 11, which follows article 10 and which measures practically every other article in this treaty, the discretion as to whether it is aggression or not is taken from the Congress of the United States. The question as to the most effectual means to carry out the provision of the article is taken from the Congress of the United States and left to the council of the league of nations.

Mr. PITTMAN. In what article?

Mr. FALL. Articles 10 and 11.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no use to argue that, Mr. President.

Mr. FALL. No; I think not.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not agree with the Senator at all. I know his position.

Mr. FALL. Then I will ask the Senator a question upon the law with which possibly we are both more familiar than this broad international law. Will the Senator kindly tell me what power and by what force of power vested in either the Congress or the United States Government are the laws of Congress under section 8, article 1, of our Constitution enforced?

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Senator will put his question short and not make a speech on it, I will endeavor to follow him.

Mr. FALL. By what power expressed in the Constitution of the United States, in any article or amendment, are the laws which Congress is invested with power to enact to be put into effect in the State of Nevada?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] discussed that so ably here the other day that I would hesitate to go any further into that. It is entirely foreign to the subject I am discussing.

Mr. FALL. I am glad to be referred to some one who pretends to know something about it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; I am very glad of it. The subject I am discussing is entirely foreign to that.

Mr. FALL. I think so, Mr. President.

Mr. PITTMAN. Having listened to the speeches of the Senators, I will proceed, with their permission.

If Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan should adopt a resolution of similar import then our Government would have absolute assurance that such would always be the construction of the treaty. Why? Because those Governments, with the United States, will always constitute a majority of the council of the league of nations, and it would even require a unanimous vote of the league of nations to decide any of the involved questions contrary to the construction agreed upon in the resolution.

Mr. President, I take it that there is no doubt with regard to that assertion. The President has stated that the construction sought by the reservationists is the construction that those great countries give the covenant, and if such is their construction they would unhesitatingly assert it in a separate resolution, if the Senate should adopt such a resolution and then our Government should bring the matter to their attention.

Undoubtedly the very reasons that make these reservations of interest to our Government must make them of equal interest to the other Governments who will have representatives upon the council of the league of nations. If that is true, then do they not simply wait for the example to be set by the United States? And if these reservations which are now urged by Senators on the other side, but which they insist be in the resolution of ratification and be made a part of the treaty, are placed in a separate resolution and adopted by more than two-thirds of this body and by the Parliaments of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, who, with the United States, constitute a majority of the council, will not the resolution constitute a permanent assurance by the council of the league of nations that they will always interpret this treaty in accordance with that resolution?

I have prepared a proposed resolution, in a form to be adopted immediately, if it meets with the approval of the Senate, so that the other Governments who will be represented upon the council of the league of nations will have an early opportunity to pass a similar resolution. I have conformed as nearly as practicable to the reservations presented by Senator KELLOGG on the 7th of August. I have not felt justified in following the construction of section 3 of Senator KELLOGG's reservations, because under a construction that may be placed upon it any nation, by declaring a question in dispute to be a domestic question involving domestic or internal matters, may avoid the whole jurisdiction of the league of nations.

I may say that I do not believe that any of the great nations would attempt to claim that a question which, under international law was recognized as a domestic question, was not a domestic question.

But there are numerous small powers; there are powers where governmental honor is not highly developed, and if placed within the power of these nations to evade the jurisdiction of the league of nations by simply claiming that the question is one that affects domestic affairs, then they, the ones that we seek to control most in their disorderly lives, will escape the entire jurisdiction of the league of nations.

I have attempted to fully protect, however, our own Government against any violation of its rights in such regard. I have formulated the resolution so that it will apply to all Governments who are members of the league, in the hope and belief that it will be adopted by such Governments.

Mr. President, I believe there are 46 Democratic Senators who will support a separate resolution such as I have suggested, and I am convinced that if those on the other side, who have been supporting reservations to be contained in the resolution of ratification and who I know to be sincerely in favor of the league of nations, will join with us, the ratification will soon be accomplished. Legislation is all a matter of compromise. The President at the conference made concessions. I am satisfied that the Democrats are ready to compromise along the same lines, and I confidently hope that the reservationists upon the other side of the Chamber will meet us in the same spirit.

APPENDIX.

DRAFT OF THE RESERVATIONS.

That when the Senate of the United States shall advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany signed at Versailles on the 28th day of June, 1919, now pending in the Senate, that it be done with and in consideration of the following understanding as to the present and future construction and interpretation to be given to the treaty:

1. That whenever the two years' notice of withdrawal from the league of nations shall have been given by any member of the league, as provided in article 1, the Government giving such notice shall be the sole judge whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of withdrawal.

2. That the suggestions of the council of the league of nations as to the means of carrying into effect the obligations of article 10, the execution of which may require the use of military or naval forces or economical measures, can only be carried out through the voluntary separate action of each of the respective governments members of the league, and that the failure of any such government to adopt the suggestions of the council of the league or to provide such military or naval forces or economical measures shall not constitute a moral or legal violation of the treaty.

3. That all domestic and political questions relating to the internal affairs of a government which is a member of the league, including immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, and commerce, are solely within the jurisdiction of such government and are not by the covenant of the league of nations submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or assembly or the league of nations or to the decision or recommendation of any other power. If a dispute arises between parties with regard to a question other than those which are herein specifically exempted as domestic questions, and it is claimed by one of the parties that such question is a domestic and political question relating to its internal affairs, then the council shall not consider or make recommendations thereon, except upon the unanimous vote of the council other than the representatives of the disputants.

4. There shall not be submitted to arbitration or inquiry by the assembly or the council any question which, in the judgment of the United States, depends upon or involves its long-established policy, commonly known as the Monroe doctrine, and it is preserved unaffected by any provision of the said treaty.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the bill may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. KING. Is it the purpose of the Senator from Utah having the bill in charge to try to secure its passage to-day?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, not at all. I wish to have the formal reading of the bill take place, and after it is read there are three committee amendments which have been authorized which I desire to present. They are merely formal amendments. After that is done, I understand it is the desire of a number of Senators that a short executive session shall be held.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That deposits of coal, phosphate, sodium, oil, oil shale, or gas, and lands containing such deposits owned by the United States, including those in national forests, but excluding those in national parks, and in lands withdrawn or reserved for military or naval uses or purposes, except as hereinafter provided, shall be subject to disposition in the form and manner provided by this act to citizens of the United States, or to any association of such persons, or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States, or of any State or Territory thereof, and in the case of coal, oil, oil shale, or gas, to municipalities: Provided, That no alien shall, by stock ownership or otherwise, own any interest in a lease acquired under the provisions of this act, except as hereinafter provided, and all certificates for stock hereafter issued in any corporation having such a lease, shall specifically and clearly show this provision on the face thereof.

COAL.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to, and upon the petition of any qualified applicant shall, divide any of the coal lands or the deposits of coal, classified and unclassified, owned by the United States, outside of the Territory of Alaska into leasing tracts of 40 acres each, or multiples thereof, and in such form as, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, will permit the most economical mining of the coal in such tracts, but in no case exceeding 2,560 acres in any one leasing tract, and thereafter the Secretary of the Interior shall, in his discretion, upon the request of any qualified applicant or on his own motion, from time to time, offer such lands or deposits of coal for leasing, and shall award leases thereon, as hereinafter provided, with preference right of lease to qualified applicants in the order of application: Provided, That no company or corporation operating a common carrier railroad shall be given or hold a permit or lease under the provisions of this act for any coal deposits except for its own use for railroad purposes; and such limitations of use shall be expressed in all permits and leases issued to such companies or corporations, and no such company or corporation shall receive or hold more than one permit or lease for each 200 miles of its railroad line, exclusive of spurs or switches and exclusive of branch lines built to connect the leased coal with the railroad, and also exclusive of parts of the railroad operated mainly by power produced otherwise than by steam.

SEC. 3. That any person, association, or corporation holding a lease of coal lands or coal deposits under this act may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, upon a finding by him that it will be for the advantage of the lessee and the United States, secure modifications of his or its original lease by including additional coal lands or coal deposits contiguous to those embraced in such lease, but in no event shall the total area embraced in such modified lease exceed in the aggregate 2,560 acres.

SEC. 4. That upon satisfactory showing by any lessee to the Secretary of the Interior that all of the workable deposits of coal within a tract covered by his or its lease will be exhausted, worked out, or removed within three years thereafter, the Secretary of the Interior may, within his discretion, lease to such lessee an additional tract of land or coal deposits, which, including the coal area remaining in the existing lease, shall not exceed 2,560 acres, through the same procedure and under the same conditions as in case of an original lease.

SEC. 5. That if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, the public interest will be subserved thereby, lessees holding under lease areas not exceeding the maximum permitted under this act may consolidate their leases or holdings through the surrender of the original lease of holdings and the inclusion of such areas in a new lease of not to exceed 2,560 acres of contiguous lands.

SEC. 6. That where coal lands aggregating 2,560 acres and subject to lease hereunder do not exist as contiguous areas, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, if, in his opinion, the interests of the public and of the lessee will be thereby subserved, to embrace in a single lease noncontiguous tracts which can be operated as a single mine or unit.

SEC. 7. That for the privilege of mining or extracting the coal in the lands covered by the lease the lessee shall pay to the United States such royalties as may be specified in the lease, which shall be fixed in advance of offering the same, and which shall be not less than 5 cents nor more than 20 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds, due and payable at the end of each third month succeeding that of the extraction of the coal from the mine, and an annual rental, payable at the date of such lease and annually thereafter, on the lands or coal deposits covered by such lease, at such rate as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior prior to offering the same, which shall be not less than 25 cents per acre for the first year thereafter, not less than 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, respectively, and not less than $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease, except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year. Leases shall be for indeterminate periods upon condition of diligent development and continued operation of the mine or mines, except when such operation shall be interrupted by strikes, the elements, or casualties not attributable to the lessee, and upon the further condition that at the end of each 20-year period succeeding the date of the lease such readjustment of terms and conditions may be made as the Secretary of the Interior may determine, unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such periods: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may, if in his judgment the public interest will be subserved thereby, in lieu of the provision herein contained requiring continuous operation of the mine or mines, provide in the lease for the payment of an annual advance royalty upon a minimum number of tons of coal, which in no case shall aggregate less than the amount of rentals herein provided for.

SEC. 8. That in order to provide for the supply of strictly local domestic needs for fuel, the Secretary of the Interior may, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe in advance, issue limited licenses or permits to individuals or associations of individuals to prospect for, mine, and take for their use but not for sale, coal from the public lands without payment of royalty for the coal mined or the land occupied, on such conditions not inconsistent with this act as in his opinion will safeguard the public interest: Provided, That this privilege shall not extend to any corporations: And provided further, That in the case of municipal corporations the Secretary of the Interior may issue such limited license or permit, for not to exceed 320 acres, upon condition that such municipal corporations will mine the coal therein under proper conditions and dispose of the same without profit: And provided further, That the acquisition or holding of a lease under the preceding sections of this act shall be no bar to the holding of such tract or operation of such mine under said limited license.

PHOSPHATES.

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to lease to any person qualified under this act any lands belonging to the United States containing deposits of phosphates, under such restrictions and upon such terms as are herein specified, through advertisement, competitive bidding, or such other methods as the Secretary of the Interior may by general regulation adopt.

SEC. 10. That each lease shall be for not to exceed 2,560 acres of land to be described by the legal subdivisions of the public-land surveys, if surveyed; if unsurveyed, to be surveyed by the Government at the expense of the applicant for lease, in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for the survey of public lands, and the lands leased shall be conformed to and taken in accordance with the legal subdivisions of such survey; deposits made to cover expense of surveys shall be deemed appropriated for that purpose; and any excess deposits shall be repaid to the person, association, or corporation making such deposits or their legal representatives: Provided, That the land embraced in any one lease shall be in compact form, the length of which shall not exceed two and one-half times its width.

SEC. 11. That for the privilege of mining or extracting the phosphates or phosphate rock covered by the lease the lessee shall pay to the United States such royalties as may be specified in the lease, which shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior in advance of offering the same, which shall be not less than 2 per cent of the gross value of the output of phosphates or phosphate rock at the mine, due and payable at the end of each third month succeeding that of the sale or other disposition of the phosphates or phosphate rock, and an annual rental payable at the date of such lease and annually thereafter on the area covered by such lease at such rate as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior prior to offering the lease, which shall be not less than 25 cents per acre for the first year thereafter, 50 cents per acre for the second, third, fourth, and fifth years, respectively, and $1 per acre for each and every year thereafter during the continuance of the lease, except that such rental for any year shall be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year. Leases shall be for indeterminate periods upon condition of a minimum annual production, except when operation shall be interrupted by strikes, the elements, or casualties not attributable to the lessee, and upon the further condition that at the end of each 20-year period succeeding the date of the lease such readjustment of forms and conditions may be made as the Secretary of the Interior shall determine unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such periods: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may permit suspension of operation under such lease when market conditions are such that the lease can not be operated except at a loss.

SEC. 12. That any qualified applicant to whom the Secretary of the Interior may grant a lease to develop and extract phosphates, or phosphate rock, under the provisions of this act shall have the right to use so much of the surface of unappropriated and unentered lands, not exceeding 40 acres, as may be determined by the Secretary of the Interior to be necessary for the proper prospecting for or development, extraction, treatment, and removal of such mineral deposits.

OIL AND GAS.

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, under such necessary and proper rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to grant to any applicant qualified under this act a prospecting permit, which shall give the exclusive right, for a period not exceeding two years, to prospect for oil or gas upon not to exceed 2,560 acres of land wherein such deposits belong to the United States and are not within any known geological structure of a producing oil or gas field upon condition that the permittee shall begin drilling operations within six months from the date of the permit, and shall, within one year from and after the date of permit, drill one or more wells for oil or gas to a depth of not less than 500 feet each, unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be sooner discovered, and shall, within two years from date of the permit, drill for oil or gas to an aggregate depth of not less than 2,000 feet unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be sooner discovered. The Secretary of the Interior may, if he shall find that the permittee has been unable with the exercise of diligence to test the land in the time granted by the permit, extend any such permit for such time, not exceeding two years, and upon such conditions as he shall prescribe. Whether the lands sought in any such application and permit are surveyed or unsurveyed the applicant shall, prior to filing his application for permit, locate such lands in a reasonably compact form and according to the legal subdivisions of the public land surveys if the land be surveyed; and in an approximately square or rectangular tract if the land be an unsurveyed tract, the length of which shall not exceed two and one-half times its width, and if he shall cause to be erected upon the land for which a permit is sought a monument not less than 4 feet high, at some conspicuous place thereon, and shall post a notice in writing on or near said monument, stating that an application for permit will be made within 30 days after date of said notice, the name of the applicant, the date of the notice, and such a general description of the land to be covered by such permit by reference to courses and distances from such monument and such other natural objects and permanent monuments as will reasonably identify the land, stating the amount thereof in acres, he shall during the period of 30 days following such marking and posting be entitled to a preference right over others to a permit for the land so identified. The applicant shall, within 90 days after receiving a permit, mark each of the corners of the tract described in the permit upon the ground with substantial monuments, so that the boundaries can be readily traced on the ground, and shall post in a conspicuous place upon the lands a notice that such permit has been granted and a description of the lands covered thereby: Provided, That in the Territory of Alaska prospecting permits may be granted to any qualified applicant for periods not exceeding four years, actual drilling operations shall begin within two years from date of permit, and oil and gas wells shall be drilled to a depth of not less than 500 feet, unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be sooner discovered, within three years from date of the permit and to an aggregate depth of not less than 2,000 feet unless valuable deposits of oil or gas shall be sooner discovered, within four years from date of permit: And provided further, That in said Territory the applicant shall have a preference right over others to a permit for land identified by temporary monuments and notice posted on or near the same for six months following such marking and posting, and upon receiving a permit he shall mark the corners of the tract described in the permit upon the ground with substantial monuments within one year after receiving such permit.

SEC. 14. That upon establishing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that valuable deposits of oil or gas have been discovered within the limits of the land embraced in any permit, the permittee shall be entitled to a lease for one-fourth of the land embraced in the prospecting permit, such area to be selected by the permittee in compact form and, if surveyed, to be described by the legal subdivisions of the public-land surveys; if unsurveyed, to be surveyed by the Government at the expense of the applicant for lease in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the lands leased shall be conformed to and taken in accordance with the legal subdivisions of such surveys; deposits made to cover expense of surveys shall be deemed appropriated for that purpose, and any excess deposits may be repaid to the person or persons making such deposit or their legal representatives. Such leases shall be for a term of 20 years with the right of renewal as prescribed in section 17 hereof upon a royalty of 5 per cent in amount or value of the production and the annual payment in advance of a rental of $1 per acre, the rental paid for any one year to be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year. The permittee shall also be entitled to a preference right for six months from notice to a lease for the remainder of the land in the prospecting permit at such royalty, not less than 12½ per cent nor more than 25 per cent, as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior, for such periods and under such other conditions as are fixed for oil or gas leases in this act.

SEC. 15. That until the permittee shall apply for lease to the one-quarter of the permit area heretofore provided for he shall pay to the United States 20 per cent of the gross value of all oil or gas secured by him from the lands embraced within his permit and sold or otherwise disposed of or held by him for sale or other disposition.

SEC. 16. That all permits and leases of lands containing oil or gas, made or issued under the provisions of this act, shall be subject to the condition that no wells shall be drilled within 200 feet of any of the outer boundaries of the lands so permitted or leased, unless the adjoining lands have been patented or the title thereto otherwise vested in private owners, and to the further condition that the permittee or lessee will, in conducting his explorations and mining operations, use all reasonable precautions to prevent waste of oil and gas developed in the land, or the entrance of water through wells drilled by him to the oil sands or oil-bearing strata, to the destruction or injury of the oil deposits. Violations of the provisions of this section shall constitute grounds for the forfeiture of the permit or lease, to be enforced through appropriate proceedings in courts of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 17. That all unappropriated deposits of oil or gas situated within the known geologic structure of a producing oil or gas field and the unentered lands containing the same, not subject to preferential lease, may be leased by the Secretary of the Interior to the highest responsible bidder by competitive bidding under general regulations to qualified applicants in areas not exceeding 640 acres and in tracts which shall not exceed in length two and one-half times their width, such leases to be conditioned upon the payment by the lessee of such bonus as may be accepted and of such royalty as may be fixed in the lease, which shall not be less than 12½ per cent in amount of value of the production, and the payment in advance of a rental of not less than $1 per acre per annum thereafter during the continuance of the lease, the rental paid for any one year to be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year. Leases shall be for a period of 20 years, with the preferential right in the lessee to renew the same for successive periods of 10 years upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such periods.

Whenever the average daily production of any oil well shall not exceed 10 barrels per day, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to reduce the royalty on future production when in his judgment the wells can not be successfully operated upon the royalty fixed in the lease. The provisions of this paragraph shall apply to all oil and gas leases made under this act.

SEC. 18. That upon relinquishment to the United States, filed in the General Land Office within six months after the approval of this act, of all right, title, and interest claimed and possessed since prior to July 3, 1910, by the claimant or his predecessor in interest under the pre-existing placer mining law to any oil or gas bearing land upon which there has been drilled one or more oil or gas wells embraced in the Executive order of withdrawal issued September 27, 1909, and not within any naval petroleum reserve, and upon payment to the United States of an amount equal to the value at the time of production of one-eighth of all the oil or gas already produced and saved from such land, the claimant, or his successor, if in possession of such land, undisputed by any other claimant prior to July 1, 1919, shall be entitled to a lease thereon from the United States for a period of 20 years, at a royalty of not less than 12½ per cent nor more than 25 per cent of all the oil or gas produced and saved: Provided, That not more than one-half of the area within the geologic oil or gas structure of a producing oil or gas field shall be leased to any one claimant under the provisions of this section when the area of such geological oil structure exceeds 640 acres. Any claimant or his successor, subject to this limitation, shall, however, have the right to select and receive the lease as in this section provided for that portion of his claim or claims equal to, but not in excess of, said one-half of the area of such geologic oil structure.

All such leases shall be made and the amount of royalty to be paid for oil and gas produced and saved after the execution of such lease shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior under appropriate rules and regulations: Provided, however, That as to all like claims situate within any naval petroleum reserve the producing wells thereon only shall be leased, together with an area of land sufficient for the operation thereof, upon the terms and payment of royalties for past and future production as herein provided for in the leasing of claims. No wells shall be drilled in the land subject to this provision within 660 feet of any such leased well without the consent of the lessee: Provided, however, That the President may, in his discretion, lease the remainder of any such claim upon which such wells have been drilled, and in the event of such leasing said claimant or his successor shall have a preference right to such lease: And provided further, That he may permit the drilling of additional wells by the claimant or his successor within the limited area of 660 feet theretofore provided for upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe.

No claimant for a lease who has been guilty of any fraud or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud, or who has not acted honestly and in good faith, shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section.

Upon the delivery and acceptance of the lease, as in this section provided, all suits brought by the Government affecting such lands may be settled and adjusted in accordance herewith and all moneys impounded in such suits or under the act of August 25, 1914 (38th Stat. L., p. 708), shall be paid over to the parties entitled thereto. In case of conflicting claimants for leases under this section, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to grant leases to one or more of them as shall be deemed just. All leases hereunder shall inure to the benefit of the claimant and all persons claiming through or under him by lease, contract, or otherwise, as their interests may appear.

SEC. 19. That any person who, at the time of any withdrawal order, or who on January 1, 1919, was a bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas lands not withdrawn from entry, and who had previously performed all acts under then existing laws necessary to valid locations thereof except to make discovery, and upon which discovery had not been made prior to the passage of this act, and who has performed work or expended on or for the benefit of such locations an amount equal in the aggregate of $250 for each location if application therefor shall be made within six months from the passage of this act, shall be entitled to prospecting permits thereon upon the same terms and conditions as other permits provided for in this act, or where any such person has heretofore made such discovery, he shall be entitled to a lease thereon under such terms as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe unless otherwise provided for in section 18 hereof: Provided, That such lands are not reserved for the use of the Navy: Provided, however, That no claimant for a permit or lease who has been guilty of any fraud or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud or who has not acted honestly and in good faith shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section: And provided further, That within one year after the passage of this act where any land has been included within an oil withdrawal or classification heretofore made after bona fide entry upon the same by a qualified homestead or desert-land entryman and where said entryman has complied with the requirements of the law relating to such entries up to the time when said withdrawal was made, said entryman or the patentee under such entry shall be given a preference right to a prospecting permit for the same under the same terms and conditions as prescribed in this act.

OIL SHALE.

SEC. 20. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to lease to any person or corporation qualified under this act any deposits of oil shale belonging to the United States and the surface of so much of the public lands containing such deposits, or land adjacent thereto, as may be required for the extraction and reduction of the leased minerals, under such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with this act, as he may prescribe; that no lease hereunder shall exceed 5,120 acres of land, to be described by the legal subdivisions of the public-land surveys, or if unsurveyed, to be surveyed by the United States, at the expense of the applicant, in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. Leases may be for indeterminate periods, upon such conditions as may be imposed by the Secretary of the Interior, including covenants relative to methods of mining, prevention of waste, and productive development. For the privilege of mining, extracting, and disposing of the oil or other minerals covered by a lease under this section the lessee shall pay to the United States such royalties as shall be specified in the lease—not less than 5 per cent nor more than 25 per cent—and an annual rental, payable at the beginning of each year, at the rate of 50 cents per acre per annum, for the lands included in the lease, the rental paid for any one year to be credited against the royalties accruing for that year; such royalties to be subject to readjustment at the end of each 20-year period by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That for the purpose of encouraging the production of petroleum products from shales the Secretary may, in his discretion, waive the payment of any royalty and rental during the first five years of any lease: Provided, That any person having a valid claim to such minerals under existing laws on January 1, 1919, shall, upon the relinquishment of such claim, be entitled to a lease under the provisions of this section, for such area of the land relinquished as shall not exceed the maximum area authorized by this section to be leased to an individual or corporation: Provided, however, That no claimant for a lease who has been guilty of any fraud or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud or who has not acted honestly and in good faith shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section: Provided further, That not more than one lease shall be granted under this section to any one person, association, or corporation.

ALASKA OIL PROVISO.

SEC. 21. That any bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas bearing lands in the Territory of Alaska, or his successors or assigns, who prior to withdrawal had complied otherwise with the requirements of the mining laws, but had made no discovery of oil or gas in wells and who prior to withdrawal had made substantial improvements for the discovery of oil or gas on or for each location or had prior to the passage of this act expended not less than $250 in improvements on or for each location shall be entitled, upon relinquishment or surrender to the United States within one year from the date of this act, or within six months after final denial or withdrawal of application for patent to a prospecting permit or permits, lease or leases, under this act covering such lands, not exceeding five permits or leases in number and not exceeding an aggregate of 1,280 acres in each: Provided, That leases in Alaska under this act whether as a result of prospecting permits or otherwise shall be upon such rental and royalties as shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior and specified in the lease, and be subject to readjustment at the end of each 20-year period of the lease: Provided further, That for the purpose of encouraging the production of petroleum products in Alaska the Secretary may, in his discretion, waive the payment of any rental or royalty not exceeding the first five years of any lease.

No claimant for a lease who has been guilty of any fraud or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud or who has not acted honestly and in good faith shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section.

SODIUM.

SEC. 22. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to grant to any qualified applicant a prospecting permit which shall give the exclusive right to prospect for chlorides, sulphates, carbonates, borates, silicates, or nitrates of sodium dissolved in and soluble in water, and accumulated by concentration in lands belonging to the United States for a period of not exceeding two years: Provided, That the area to be included in such a permit shall be not exceeding 2,560 acres of land in reasonably compact form: Provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to lands in San Bernardino County, Calif.

SEC. 23. That upon showing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that valuable deposits of one of the substances enumerated in section 22 hereof has been discovered by the permittee within the area covered by his permit and that such land is chiefly valuable therefor the permittee shall be entitled to a lease for one-half of the land embraced in the prospecting permit, at a royalty of one-eighth of the amount or value of the production, to be taken and described by legal subdivisions of the public-land surveys, or if the land be not surveyed by survey executed at the cost of the permittee in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. The permittee shall also have the preference right to lease the remainder of the lands embraced within the limits of his permit at a royalty to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior. Lands known to contain such valuable deposits as are enumerated in section 22 hereof and not covered by permits or leases, except such lands as are situated in said county of San Bernardino, shall be held subject to lease, and may be leased by the Secretary of the Interior through advertisement, competitive bidding, or such other methods as he may by general regulations adopt, and in such areas as he shall fix, not exceeding 2,560 acres; all leases to be conditioned upon the payment by the lessee of such royalty as may be fixed in the lease, and the payment in advance of a rental of 50 cents per acre for the first calendar year or fraction thereof and $1 per acre per annum thereafter during the continuance of the lease, the rental paid for any one year to be credited on the royalty for that year. Leases may be for indeterminate periods upon such conditions not inconsistent herewith as may be incorporated in each lease or prescribed in general regulation theretofore issued by the Secretary of the Interior, including covenants relative to mining methods, waste, period of preliminary development, and minimum production, and a lessee under this section may be lessee of the remaining lands in his permit.

SEC. 24. That in addition to areas of such mineral land which may be included in any such prospecting permits or leases, the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, may grant to a permittee or lessee of lands containing sodium deposits, and subject to the payment of an annual rental of not less than 25 cents per acre, the exclusive right to use, during the life of the permit or lease, a tract of unoccupied nonmineral public land, not exceeding 40 acres in area, for camp sites, refining works, and other purposes connected with and necessary to the proper development and use of the deposits covered by the permit or lease.

GENERAL PROVISIONS APPLICABLE TO COAL, PHOSPHATE, SODIUM, OIL, OIL SHALE, AND GAS LEASES.

SEC. 25. That the Secretary of the Interior shall reserve and may exercise the authority to cancel any prospecting permit upon failure by the permittee to exercise due diligence in the prosecution of the prospecting work in accordance with the terms and conditions stated in the permit, and shall insert in every such permit issued under the provisions of this act appropriate provisions for its cancellation by him.

SEC. 26. That no person, association, or corporation, except as herein provided, shall take or hold more than one coal, phosphate, or sodium lease during the life of such lease in any one State; no person, association, or corporation shall take or hold at one time more than three oil or gas leases granted hereunder in any one State, and not more than one lease within the geologic structure of the same producing oil or gas field; no corporation shall hold any interest as a stockholder of another corporation in more than such number of leases; and no person or corporation shall take or hold any interest or interests as a member of an association or associations or as a stockholder of a corporation or corporations holding a lease under the provisions hereof which, together with the area embraced in any direct holding of a lease under this act, or which, together with any other interest or interests as a member of an association or associations or as a stockholder of a corporation or corporations holding a lease under the provisions hereof, for any kind of mineral leased hereunder, exceeds in the aggregate an amount equivalent to the maximum number of acres of the respective kinds of minerals allowed to any one lessee under this act. Any interests held in violation of this act shall be forfeited to the United States by appropriate proceedings instituted by the Attorney General for that purpose in the proper United States district court, except that any ownership or interest forbidden in this act which may be aquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held for two years and not longer after its acquisition: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to limit sections 18 and 19 or to prevent any number of lessees under the provisions of this act from combining their several interests so far as may be necessary for the purposes of constructing and carrying on the business of a refinery, or of establishing and constructing as a common carrier a pipe line or lines or railroads to be operated and used by them jointly in the transportation of oil from their several wells, or from the wells of other lessees under this act, or the transportation of coal: Provided further, That any combination for such purpose or purposes shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior on application to him for permission to form the same.

SEC. 27. That rights of way through the public lands, including the forest reserves, of the United States are hereby granted for pipe-line purposes for the transportation of oil or natural gas to any applicant possessing the qualifications provided in section 1 of this act to the extent of the ground occupied by the said pipe line and 25 feet on each side of the same under such regulations as to survey, location, application, and use as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for such rights of way through the public lands, and the Secretary of Agriculture for such rights of way through national forests, and upon the express condition that such pipe lines shall be constructed, operated, and maintained as common carriers: Provided, That no right of way shall hereafter be granted over said lands for the transportation of oil or natural gas except under and subject to the provisions, limitations, and conditions of this section. Failure to comply with the provisions of this section or the regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior shall be ground for forfeiture of the grant by the United States district court for the district in which the property, or some part thereof, is located in an appropriate proceeding.

SEC. 28. That any permit, lease, occupation, or use permitted under this act shall reserve to the Secretary of the Interior the right to permit, upon such terms as he may determine to be just, for joint or several use, such easements or rights of way, including easements in tunnels upon, through, or in the lands leased, occupied, or used as may be necessary or appropriate to the working of the same, or of other lands containing the deposits described in this act, and the treatment and shipment of the products thereof by or under authority of the Government, its lessees, or permittees, and for other public purposes: Provided, That said Secretary, in his discretion, in making any lease under this act, may reserve to the United States the right to lease, sell, or otherwise dispose of the surface of the lands embraced within such lease under existing law or laws hereafter enacted, in so far as said surface is not necessary for use of the lessee in extracting and removing the deposits therein: Provided further, That if such reservation is made it shall be so determined before the offering of such lease: And provided further, That the said Secretary, during the life of the lease, is authorized to issue such permits for easements herein provided to be reserved.

SEC. 29. That no lease issued under the authority of this act shall be assigned or sublet, except with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior. The lessee may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be permitted at any time to make written relinquishment of all rights under such a lease, and upon acceptance thereof be thereby relieved of all future obligations under said lease, and may with like consent surrender any legal subdivision of the area included within the lease. Each lease shall contain provisions for the purpose of insuring the exercise of reasonable diligence, skill, and care in the operation of said property; a provision that such rules for the safety and welfare of the miners and for the prevention of undue waste as may be prescribed by said Secretary shall be observed, including a restriction of the workday to not exceeding eight hours in any one day for underground workers, except in cases of emergency, provisions securing the workmen complete freedom of purchase, requiring the payment of wages at least twice a month in lawful money of the United States, and providing proper rules and regulations to insure the fair and just weighing or measurement of the coal mined by each miner, and such other provisions as he may deem necessary for the protection of the interests of the United States, for the prevention of monopoly, and for the safeguarding of the public welfare: Provided, That none of such provisions shall be in conflict with the laws of the State in which the leased property is situated.

SEC. 30. That any lease issued under the provisions of this act may be forfeited and canceled by an appropriate proceeding in the United States district court for the district in which the property, or some part thereof, is located whenever the lessee fails to comply with any of the provisions of this act, of the lease, or of the general regulations promulgated under this act and in force at the date of the lease; and the lease may provide for resort to appropriate methods for the settlement of disputes or for remedies for breach of specified conditions thereof.

SEC. 31. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe necessary and proper rules and regulations and to do any and all things necessary to carry out and accomplish the purposes of this act: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed or held to affect the rights of the States or other local authority to exercise any rights which they may have, including the right to levy and collect taxes upon improvements, output of mines, or other rights, property, or assets of any lessee of the United States.

SEC. 32. That all statements, representations, or reports required by the Secretary of the Interior under this act shall be upon oath, unless otherwise specified by him, and in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of the Interior may require.

SEC. 33. That the provisions of this act shall also apply to all deposits of coal, phosphate, sodium, oil, oil shale, or gas in the lands of the United States, which lands may have been or may be disposed of under laws reserving to the United States such deposits, with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same, subject to such conditions as are or may hereafter be provided by such laws reserving such deposits.

SEC. 34. That 10 per cent of all money received from sales, royalties, and rentals under the provisions of this act, excepting those from Alaska, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and credited to miscellaneous receipts, 45 per cent of the amounts derived from such royalties and rentals shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, and 45 per cent of the amounts derived from such royalties and rentals shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury after the expiration of each fiscal year to the State within the boundaries of which the leased lands or deposits are or were located, said moneys to be used by such State or subdivisions thereof for the construction and maintenance of public roads or for the support of public schools or other public educational institutions, as the legislature of the State may direct: Provided, That any moneys which may accrue to the United States under the provisions of this act from lands within the naval petroleum reserves shall be deposited in the Treasury as "miscellaneous receipts."

SEC. 35. That all royalty accruing to the United States under any oil or gas lease or permit under this act on demand of the Secretary of the Interior shall be paid in oil or gas.

Upon granting any oil or gas lease under this act and at the beginning of each five-year period thereafter during said lease, the Secretary of the Interior shall offer for sale, upon notice and advertisement on sealed bids or at public auction, all royalty oil and gas accruing or reserved to the United States under such lease. Such advertisement and sale shall reserve to the Secretary of the Interior the right to reject all bids and the right to require redelivery of the actual oil or gas or any refined product thereof whenever within his judgment the interest of the United States demands; and in cases where no satisfactory bid is received or where the accepted bidder fails to complete the purchase, the Secretary of the Interior within his discretion may readvertise such royalty for sale, or sell at private sale for such period, or accept the value thereof from the lessee, in each case reserving the right to require redelivery of the oil or gas or any product being refined therefrom by such purchaser or lessee: Provided, however, That advertisement or sale as herein required may be dispensed with in specific cases upon a finding by the Secretary of the Interior that such course is in the interest of the public good.

SEC. 36. That the deposits of coal, phosphate, sodium, oil, oil shale, and gas, herein referred to, in lands valuable for such minerals shall be subject to disposition only in the form and manner provided in this act, except as to valid claims existent at date of the passage of this act and thereafter maintained in compliance with the laws under which initiated, which claims may be perfected under such laws.

Mr. SMOOT. In section 7, page 6, line 2, after the words "tons of," I move to strike out the word "coals" and to insert the word "coal."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. In section 16, page 13, line 23, after the word "his," I move to strike out "exporations" and to insert "explorations."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. In section 17, page 14, line 18, after the word "amount," I move to strike out "of" and to insert "or," so as to read:

Which shall not be less than 12½ per cent in amount or value of the production.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to be inserted in section 19, page 18, after the word "hereof," in line 17.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 19, page 18, line 17, after the word "hereof," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That where such prospecting permit is granted upon land within any known geological structure of a producing oil or gas field, the royalty to be fixed in any lease thereafter granted thereon or any portion thereof shall not be less than 12½ per cent nor more than 25 per cent of all the oil or gas produced and saved.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. In section 19, page 18, after the word "Provided," I move to insert the word "however."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 19, page 18, line 17, after the word "Provided," it is proposed to insert the word "however," so as to read:

Provided, however, That such lands are not reserved for the use of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Utah will pardon the Chair, the Chair observes on page 16 of the bill that the word "geologic" is used in line 4, and "geological" in line 7, and "geologic" in line 12. Does the Senator from Utah prefer either of those words, and if so, which? The Secretary will state the places where the words occur.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 4, the word "geologic" is used before the words "oil or gas structure"; the word "geological" on line 7 before the words "oil structure," and the word "geologic" on line 12 before the words "oil structure."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think that ought to be "geologic" in each place; so wherever there is a difference I will ask the Secretary to make the amendment, so as to read "geologic structure."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the Senator desires the amendment which he has just tendered to conform to that change?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; so as to use the same word all through the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the change will be made in the reported bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move to strike out beginning on line 1, page 32, all of lines 1, 2, 3, and the first word on line 4, and to insert:

The Secretary of the Interior shall have the right to offer for sale, for periods of not exceeding five years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 32, strike out lines 1, 2, 3, and the word "sale" in line 4, and insert:

The Secretary of the Interior shall have the right to offer for sale, for periods of not exceeding five years.

The amendment was agreed to.

EFFECT OF TREATY RESERVATIONS.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to a matter which has been referred to here this afternoon, and which up to the present time I have had no opportunity to refer to specifically.

I stated to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] that I would, a little later on, answer some of the propositions advanced by him with reference to the conference between some of the Senators and the President of the United States on yesterday, and particularly with reference to a certain colloquy between the President of the United States and myself, as the Senator from Nevada referred specifically to this colloquy, and undertook to place his construction upon the words of the President of the United States.

I was reminded, Mr. President, of the fact that when the President of the United States came into this Chamber to address the Senate on the occasion when he laid before this body the treaties that are now under discussion, he made reference to some of the bitter fruits of the attempted grafting of the new system proposed to be adopted by the President upon the old system which had prevailed prior to the conference at Paris and Versailles. I commented at that time upon the fact that there were to be found in this Chamber Senators whose intense loyalty to the President urged them heroically to rush to his relief, and at that time expressed the view which I have since had confirmed, sir, that the President of the United States in expressing himself needs no assistance from his loyal colleagues and heroic would-be defenders in this body.

The President of the United States upon yesterday was, I think, frank and open and manly in his treatment of the Senators; he was patient, and endeavored to give them information such as he thought he could give them. Much to my regret he seemed to be impressed with the view that there were some things about which he was not at liberty to speak openly. Some of the Senators went to the White House with the understanding that there should be nothing communicated in confidence. That being the understanding, to which the President agreed, the President refrained from discussing certain matters which I would have been glad to have discussed openly. In so far as we did have a discussion, it was perfectly frank upon both sides, and I thought perfectly understood at that time; and I think the President of the United States understood, as he generally understands, what he was saying.

Now, with reference to the particular point at issue:

The President had stated in his opening statement, read to the committee, among other things—I am not attempting to quote him—that he would find difficulty in undertaking to approach Weimar, the German capital, if reservations were embodied in the ratifying resolution accompanying the ratification of the treaty. In answer to certain questions propounded by different Senators he practically reiterated that statement, and it appeared to be the desire of certain Senators to impress the great importance of this fact upon the record then being made—that aside from the possible necessity of approaching three or four other powers and securing their acquiescence in the reservations as drawn by this body, in the event such were made, there was the overwhelming difficulty in reopening negotiations with Germany. I have heard that same difficulty voiced here, and I have noticed in many of the interviews which are so prolific with various Senators, as they appear in the daily press from day to day, that great importance and stress has been laid upon this proposition—that Germany had been forced by duress, by the presence of a victorious army, to sign this treaty; that now, large numbers of the military forces having been demobilized, it would be extremely difficult, if not practically impossible, to obtain Germany's agreement to any change whatsoever being made in the treaty or the league articles, which are a portion of the treaty, as written and as they existed when the instrument was signed by her.

These were the circumstances under which the questions were propounded by myself, rather in the nature of suggestions, and the answers of the President to those questions were brought out.

The President very frankly stated his reasons, or one of the principal reasons, for combining the league of nations with the treaty. As he says in answering my first question, where he was not agreeing with me:

> One of the reasons for putting the league in the treaty was that Germany was not going to be admitted to the league immediately, and we felt that it was very necessary that we should get her acknowledgment—acceptance—of the league as an international authority.

The words speak for themselves. They need no interpretation. The purpose of securing the signature of Germany to this peace treaty with the league article in it was that Germany might be forced or compelled by her signature and her agreement to acknowledge the international authority of the league. That purpose was achieved. That purpose, I may say in passing, will in no sense be lost or weakened by any amendments which the Senate of the United States may write into the league articles, aside from the question as to our authority so to rewrite the league articles. The purpose in view was to require of Germany her recognition of the international authority of the league of nations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FALL. With pleasure.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that there was an additional purpose, namely, that there are many provisions of the league relating to Germany, to the administrative affairs of Germany, at least for an indefinite period, which would require some instrumentality in order to carry out, and the league was the instrumentality which had been selected?

Mr. FALL. Upon what international mind does the Senator from Utah conceive that that purpose operated?

Mr. KING. I do not know that I quite apprehend the Senator's interrogatory.

Mr. FALL. If I understand the Senator's question, he asked if Germany's signature would not be required to the treaty or the league articles, because in the treaty itself there are certain provisions with reference to the operations of the council of the league.

Mr. KING. As I had intended to propound the question, it was this: Was there not an additional reason for requiring Germany's signature?

Mr. FALL. Additional reason upon whom?

Mr. KING. An additional reason for Germany to insist upon the league, namely, that there were provisions of the treaty which related to Germany which could not be carried into effect except that there was an agency created that could carry into effect the provisions.

Mr. FALL. That is the question I am asking the Senator. He says "additional reasons." Operating upon what international mind, or emanating from what international mind, are those reasons? Does the Senator mean to say that Germany signed it because of the fact that under the provisions of the treaty certain commissions to be appointed by the league should operate? Was that the reason why Germany signed it?

Mr. KING. I do not know that that was one of the reasons which impelled Germany to sign it, but that was one of the things required of Germany by those who proposed the treaty to her.

Mr. FALL. Then the Senator's answer is that the reason emanated from those requiring Germany to sign the league articles?

Mr. KING. Absolutely. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. FALL. Not upon the mind of Germany, because Germany was forced under duress to sign the treaty.

Mr. KING. I do not know that I subscribe to the view that she was forced under duress. Germany signed the treaty that was tendered to her. Of course, her delegates protested against it, but she signed the treaty, and the allied Governments, or associated powers tendering the treaty, required as one of the provisions of the treaty that there should be a league-of-nations covenant in the treaty, and that this league should be used as an instrumentality for carrying into effect many of the provisions of the league which related to Germany.

Mr. FALL. Not at all, because in one of the league articles there is a provision by which the very requirements in the treaty may be changed at any time that the league sees fit to change them, and without consultation with Germany.

Mr. President, of course this divergence was not material to the matter I had in mind in undertaking to explain to the Senate the attitude of the President of the United States and the Senator from New Mexico yesterday during the colloquy; that is, the question which the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] asked me is not material to that subject.

The President expressed clearly the purpose he had in mind by himself and others in requiring the signature of Germany to the treaty with the league articles in it for the purpose of demanding of Germany recognition of the league authority in international affairs. In answer to that suggestion of the President, I will read the colloquy just as it took place:

> The PRESIDENT. Therefore, I think it would be necessary for her to acquiesce in a league the powers of which were differently construed.
> Senator FALL. Precisely; but the method of her acquiescing would be by her accepting the invitation, when extended, either to join the league or not to join the league. In other words, upon ratification by three of the powers a status of peace is established, and as to those three powers and Germany all the rules and regulations contained in the treaty of peace become operative. As to the other nations which have not ratified it, the status of peace exists; that is, war has terminated. Now, that being the case, and Germany being out of the league—not having been invited to join the league—if in ratifying the treaty we ratify it with certain explanations and reservations, even in the ratifying resolution, when the time comes and Germany is invited to become a member of the league, or when she applies, under the admission clause of the league, for membership therein, if she enters she, of course, accepts our reservations. If she makes a qualified application, then it is for the league itself to consider whether she will be admitted with any qualifications.
> The PRESIDENT. I do not accept your reasoning in the matter, Senator, because it is not merely a question of either membership or nonmembership. The covenant is a part of the treaty. It is a part of the treaty which she has signed, and we are not at liberty to change any part of that treaty without the acquiescence of the other contracting parties.

Mr. President, it was evidently the President's view that Germany having signed the treaty, we were not at liberty to change any part of it at all without Germany's consent. While he did not use the word "Germany," he said "the other contracting parties." Let me say to you that this matter had been very clear in my mind for some time, and to impress my point of view upon the President I used an illustration:

> Senator FALL. Well, Mr. President, of course it is not my purpose to enter into an argument, but we are here for information. There are provisions for the amendment of the articles. Germany is out of the league. Any amendment proposed by the other members of the league prior to her coming into the league would not be submitted to her, would it, she not being a member?
> The PRESIDENT. I will admit that that point had not occurred to me. No; she would not.

The provision to which I referred and to which I desired to call the attention of the President, and with which the other Senators here are of course familiar, as was the President, was article 26:

> Amendments to this covenant will take effect when ratified by the members of the league whose representatives composed the council and by a majority of the members of the league whose representatives compose the assembly.

My purpose, I think I may say without undertaking to interpret the President's mind, was to call his attention to the provisions of the league itself as showing that his previous conception of the terms was erroneous. I think the President acquiesced in my view as clearly as language can be made to express such acquiescence, and that openly, manfully, and honestly he said that this question had not occurred to him, and that I was right. That was all there was to it, unless you want my judgment confirmed by reading a little further.

Again this "plumed knight" rushed to the assistance of the President. The Senate may realize that it was rather an exchange of diplomatic notes, where, the minds having agreed, the notes issued by one party are repeated by the other to evidence their mutual understanding, not, of course, that I place myself upon the same diplomatic plane as the President, but in this particular matter I was one of the negotiating parties. I repeat:

The PRESIDENT. I will admit that that point had not occurred to me. No; she would not.

Senator FALL. Then, so far as we are concerned, we could make a recommendation in the nature of an amendment.

The President did not answer that. He was not allowed to do so—

Senator PITTMAN. She has already agreed by this treaty that she has signed that the members may amend it.

The PRESIDENT. Yes.

Senator FALL. Precisely; and we could come in with an amendment.

This is the end of it. This is all there is to it. To my mind the proposition has been perfectly clear, and when the President's attention was called to the point of view which I had taken some time since his mind seemed to clear up instantly, and I thought that his agreement with me was perfect.

Mr. President, again this reminds me of something that I have heard before, an attempt to translate the words and interpret the meaning of the President of the United States. I wonder if sometimes, when he happens not to have the madding crowds around him, he may not say, "God, deliver me from my friends; I can take care of my enemies myself."

FOREIGN EXCHANGE.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have felt some disappointment that the Senate has not acted upon the matter of furnishing the people of the United States with the means of putting the dollar at par throughout the world, as well as within our own borders, by passing S. 2472 and S. 2767, the Edge bill to create a Federal reserve foreign bank. The dollar exchange is at par in New York, San Francisco, and Chicago to-day, but the international exchanges are so upset that in London merchants engaging a million dollars of credit in New York would pay a flat bonus of $137,000 to the bankers or to whoever extended the credit of $1,000,000. In France the condition is much worse. The French merchant who buys a million dollars' worth of American goods—wheat, copper, cotton, manufactured products—would pay $570,000 bonus for $1,000,000 of credit when he sells 8.13 francs for a dollar. There is real usury, if the world ever saw it. Italy on an exchange of 9.49 lire, the exchange quoted yesterday, which I took from the morning Times, would pay a flat bonus of $851,000 for $1,000,000 of credit in this country. At 5.18 lire for a dollar, there is a profit of 4.31 lire when exchange reaches 9.49, or a profit of 85 per cent when par of exchange returns, as it must.

The British and the French and the Italians were willing to lay down their lives for liberty and civilization side by side with us. We fought for them and with them in a common cause on the battle field, and I now show in plain terms what we are giving them in the way of commercial and financial accommodation.

I put in the RECORD the market quotations from the Times on this international exchange.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Yesterday's closing rates.

Normal rates of exchange:		Demand or checks.
4.8665	London	$4.18¾
5.1813	Paris	8.13
5.1813	Belgium	8.27

Domestic exchanges.

Mr. President, the bankers deal with this question as merchants deal with commodities. They buy and sell credits. They make their money in that way. When these exchanges react—and they must react in a comparatively short time—they will cash in these enormous bonuses which are being charged now—either they or their friends to whom they sell these balances.

I call the attention of the Senate to it; I call the attention of the country to it; and if the Congress and the Government of the United States afford no relief to our commerce and no justice to our recent allies they will justly deserve the condemnation of all the world.

I can honestly wipe my hands of the responsibility, for I have offered the legislative remedies and have appealed strenuously and many times to the Treasury Department officials to use their power, and I have appealed to the President.

The break in international exchange is, in my opinion, largely due to short selling; that is, the banks and trust companies handling foreign bills of exchange are selling credits in terms of lire, francs, sterling, and so forth, which they intend to cover by buying bills drawn on London, Paris, and Rome for wheat, steel, copper, machinery, and American goods at a still lower price in the immediate future, and thus make a commission.

People are buying such exchange futures because of the huge bonus that sometime will be paid when exchange reacts to par.

There should be made a thorough investigation of these speculations and exchange stabilized. What is urgently needed is credit from the American investing public to cover the immediate crying necessities of Europe while reacting from war. A Federal reserve foreign bank would serve magnificently, if Congress would pass the bill I presented in February, 1918, and August 12, 1919, as S. 2767.

The Edge bill would help greatly—S. 2472, Calendar No. 100, reported July 25, 1919. It provides for the organization of foreign banking corporations with liberal provisions under Federal charter and under supervision of the Federal Reserve Board. These banks could sell debentures against European credits at a good interest rate to American investors and furnish the credit so vitally needed by Europe at a decent rate, and thus afford a market for our surplus goods.

The amendments I proposed—S. J. Res. 88—to the War Finance Corporation act would release for use large credits which the corporation is permitting to lie idle on the ground that the statute does not give sufficient power and that bankers and exporters can not or will not avail themselves of the provisions they regard as hazardous.

Congress must act or neglect a most serious duty to our national commerce and industries.

The power and obligation lie with the Republican majority, who ought not to need urging from this side of the Chamber, but, for one, I will cooperate gladly with those who have the vision and the will to serve our common country. Let us forget partisanship for a while until the high cost of living is abated both at home and abroad.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 8076. An act authorizing the county of Montgomery, Tenn., to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River within 7 miles of Clarksville, Tenn.; and

H. R. 8117. An act for the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Falls, Wyoming County, Pa., were read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

H. R. 3175. An act authorizing local drainage districts to drain certain public lands in the State of Arkansas, counties of Mississippi and Poinsett, and subjecting said lands to taxation, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

H. R. 7972. An act to improve the administration of the Postal Service in the Territory of Hawaii was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The bill will be referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

Mr. SMOOT. It ought to be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the opinion of the Chair, but the Chair's advisers suggested the other committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I think similar bills have always been handled by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

ENFORCEMENT OF PROHIBITION.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that immediately on the disposition of the oil-land-leasing bill I shall move that the Senate take up for consideration Order of Business 129, House bill 6810, the prohibition bill.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, August 21, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 20, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Father, impress upon our minds indelibly that each day is a day of judgment, and the sum of each man's days is the final judgment.

Hence it behooves us as individuals to live day by day to the high-water mark of Christian manhood. It is not so much what a man does as it is the motive he puts behind it.

"Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

"For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting."

O Lord and Master of us all,
Whate'er our name or sign;
We own Thy sway, we hear Thy call,
We test our lives by Thine.

Lead us, we beseech Thee, to the life eternal. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FILING OF A PETITION.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry. I have a petition that has been sent me, signed by 33,000 discharged soldiers, sailors, marines, and citizens of northern Ohio, in favor of my bill giving a year's pay to discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines as a bonus. I would like to have that petition referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Do I have to get unanimous consent or can the Speaker direct that that be done?

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman put the bill in the basket?

Mr. EMERSON. I filed my bill the first day of the session. Now I have this petition.

The SPEAKER. Has the bill been referred?

Mr. EMERSON. It has.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the time of the House ought not to be consumed by such question, which will readily be answered by the filing clerk in private. The gentleman can indicate where his petition shall be filed.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting two letters from Secretary Glass on the question of the financial condition of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by filing letters from the Secretary of the Treasury. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by placing in the RECORD an editorial from the May number of the American Federationist by Samuel Gompers, and a recent editorial from the New York Times, both of which relate to the soldier settlement bill now before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. To-day is Calendar Wednesday——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a quorum present, and I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. Evidently no quorum is present——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anthony	Eagle	Kettner	Rogers

Eagan	Kennedy, Iowa	Riordan

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and eight Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. Today is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the roll of committees.

The Clerk called the roll of committees.

THE AMERICAN LEGION.

Mr. VOLSTEAD (when the Committee on the Judiciary was reached). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 6808) to incorporate the American Legion.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary calls up the bill H. R. 6808, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6808) to incorporate the American Legion.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GARRETT. I raise the question of consideration on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee raises the question of consideration. Those who are in favor now of considering the bill will say "aye"; as many as are opposed will say "no."

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, is this a bill to incorporate——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. To incorporate the soldiers of this war.

Mr. GARRETT. To incorporate what?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The soldiers, sailors, and marines of this war.

Mr. GARRETT. I withdraw the demand.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I would like, if possible, to agree upon time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas on March 17, 1919, a caucus of delegates representing the various organizations of the American Expeditionary Forces was held, under official authority, at Paris, in the Republic of France, for the purpose of forming an organization of veterans of the military and naval forces of the United States in the War of 1917–18; and

Whereas a caucus for similar purposes was held in St. Louis, Mo., May 8 to 10, 1919; and

Whereas the said caucuses adopted declarations of principles, and as a result of said caucuses an organization has been formed, under the name of the American Legion, to carry out the principles and purposes adopted by said caucuses; and

Whereas the scope and importance of the principles and work of the American Legion require its incorporation by the Congress of the United States: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That William S. Bean, of North Carolina; Charles H. Brent, of New York; William H. Brown, of Connecticut; G. Edward Buxton, jr., of Rhode Island; Bennett C. Clark, of Missouri; Richard Derby, of New York; L. H. Everidge, of Texas; Milton Foreman, of Illinois; Ruby Garrett, of Missouri; Fred A. Griffith, of Oklahoma; Roy C. Haines, of Maine; J. F. J. Herbert, of Massachusetts; Roy Hoffman, of Oklahoma; Fred B. Humphrey, of New Mexico; John W. Inzer, of Alabama; Stuart S. Janney, of Maryland; Luke Lea, of Tennessee; Henry Leonard, of Colorado; Henry D. Lindsley, of Texas; Ogden L. Mills, of New York; Thomas W. Miller, of Delaware; Edward Myers, of Pennsylvania; Franklin D'Olier, of Pennsylvania; W. G. Price, jr., of Pennsylvania; S. A. Ritchie, of New York; Theodore Roosevelt, jr., of New York; Albert A. Sprague, of Illinois; John J. Sullivan, of Washington; Dale Shaw, of Iowa; Daniel G. Stivers, of Montana; H. J. Turney, of Ohio; George A. White, of Oregon; Eric Fisher Wood, of Pennsylvania; George H. Wood, of Ohio, their associates and their successors, are hereby created a body corporate and politic in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That the name of this corporation shall be "The American Legion," and by that name it shall have perpetual succession with power to sue and be sued in courts of law and equity within the jurisdiction of the United States; to hold such real and personal estate as shall be necessary for corporate purposes and receive real and personal property by gift, devise, or bequest; to adopt a seal and the same to alter or destroy at pleasure; to have the right to have and to use in carrying out the purposes hereinafter designated such emblems or badges as may be adopted by the duly constituted governing body of the corporation; to have offices and conduct its business and affairs within and without the District of Columbia, and in the several States, Territories, and possessions of the United States; to establish and maintain State and Territorial organizations and local chapter or post organizations; to make and adopt a constitution and by-laws and regulations not inconsistent with the laws of the United States of America, or of any State thereof; to publish a magazine and other publications, and generally to do all such acts and things as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act and promote the purposes and principles of said corporation.

SEC. 3. That the purposes of this corporation shall be to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States of America; to safeguard and transmit to posterity the principles of justice, freedom, and democracy for which the members of the military and naval services of the United States contended in the War of 1917–18; to maintain law and order; to foster and perpetuate a 100 per cent Americanism; to inculcate the duty and obligation of the citizen to the community, State, and Nation; to preserve and develop equality of right and opportunity in the United States; to promote the social and industrial welfare of the citizens of the United States; to make right the master of might both in domestic and international affairs; and to promote peace and good will among the people of the United States and the nations of the earth; to cement the ties of comradeship formed in service; to preserve the memories and incidents of the Great War, and to consecrate the comradeship of its members by their devotion to mutual helpfulness and service to the Nation.

SEC. 4. That all persons shall be eligible to membership in the American Legion who were in the naval or military service of the United States during the period between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, both dates inclusive, and all persons who served in the military or naval services of any of the Governments associated with the United States during the Great War, provided that they were citizens of the United States at the time of their enlistment and who are again citizens at the time of application, except such persons as were separated from the service under terms amounting to dishonorable discharge, and also those persons who refused to perform their military duties on the ground of conscientious objection.

SEC. 5. That while requiring that every member of the American Legion perform his full duty as a citizen, according to his own conscience and understanding, the organization shall be absolutely nonpartisan and shall not be used for the dissemination of partisan principles or for the promotion of the candidacy of any person seeking public office or preferment.

SEC. 6. That said corporation may acquire by way of gift all the assets of the existing national organization known as the American Legion after defraying or providing for any debts or liabilities to the discharge of which such assets shall be applicable; that said corporation shall have no power to issue stock or declare or pay dividends; its objects and purposes being solely of a patriotic and benevolent character, and not for pecuniary profit of its members, no member or employee thereof shall receive profit or compensation of any kind except such as shall represent reasonable compensation for services rendered.

SEC. 7. That said corporation and its State and local subdivisions shall have the sole and exclusive right to have and to use in carrying out its purposes the name "The American Legion" and all emblems and badges, description, or designating marks and words or phrases now or heretofore used by the American Legion, it being understood that nothing in this act shall interfere or conflict with established or vested rights.

SEC. 8. That the said the American Legion shall as soon as possible after the 1st day of January in each year hereafter make and transmit to the Secretary of War a report of its proceedings for the preceding calendar year, including a full, complete, and itemized report of receipts and expenditures of its national organization of whatever kind, which report shall be duly audited by the War Department, and a copy of said report shall be transmitted to Congress by the War Department.

SEC. 9. That Congress shall have the right to repeal, alter, or amend this act at any time.

The following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all after the title of the bill, on page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the following persons, to-wit: William S. Bean, of North Carolina; Charles H. Brent, of New York; William H. Brown, of Connecticut; G. Edward Buxton, jr., of Rhode Island; Bennett C. Clark, of Missouri; Richard Derby, of New York; L. H. Everidge, of Texas; Milton Foreman, of Illinois; Ruby D. Garrett, of Missouri; Fred J. Griffith, of Oklahoma; Roy C. Haines, of Maine; J. F. J. Herbert, of Massachusetts;

Roy Hoffman, of Oklahoma; Fred B. Humphreys, of New Mexico; John W. Inzer, of Alabama; Stuart S. Janney, of Maryland; Luke Lea, of Tennessee; Henry Leonard, of Colorado; Henry D. Lindsley, of Texas; Ogden L. Mills, of New York; Thomas W. Miller, of Delaware; Edward Myers, of Pennsylvania; Franklin D'Olier, of Pennsylvania; W. G. Price, jr., of Pennsylvania; S. A. Ritchie, of New York; Theodore Roosevelt, jr., of New York; Albert A. Sprague, of Illinois; John J. Sullivan, of Washington; Dale Shaw, of Iowa; Daniel G. Stivers, of Montana; H. J. Turney, of Ohio; George A. White, of Oregon; Eric Fisher Wood, of Pennsylvania; George H. Wood, of Ohio, and such persons as may be chosen who are members of the 'American Legion,' an unincorporated patriotic society of the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Great War, 1917–18, known as the 'American Legion,' are hereby created and declared to be a body corporate. The name of this corporation shall be the 'American Legion.'

"SEC. 2. Said persons named in section 1 and such other persons as may be selected are hereby authorized to meet to complete the organization of said corporation by the selection of officers, the adoption of a constitution and by-laws, and by the doing of all other things necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act, at which meeting any person duly accredited as a delegate from any local or State organization of the existing unincorporated organization known as the 'American Legion' shall be permitted to participate in the proceedings thereof.

"SEC. 3. The purpose of this corporation shall be: To promote peace and good will among the peoples of the United States and all the nations of the earth; to preserve the memories and incidents of the Great War of 1917–18; to cement the ties of love and comradeship born of service; and to consecrate the efforts of its members to mutual helpfulness and service to their country.

"SEC. 4. The corporation created by this act shall have the following powers: To have perpetual succession with power to sue and be sued in courts of law and equity; to receive, hold, own, use, and dispose of such real estate and personal property as shall be necessary for its corporate purposes; to adopt a corporate seal and alter the same at pleasure; to adopt a constitution, by-laws, and regulations to carry out its purposes, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States or of any State; to use in carrying out the purposes of the corporation such emblems and badges as it may adopt; to establish and maintain offices for the conduct of its business; to establish State and Territorial organizations and local chapter or post organizations; to publish a magazine or other publications; and generally to do any and all such acts and things as may be necessary and proper in carrying into effect the purposes of the corporation.

"SEC. 5. No person shall be a member of this corporation unless he served in the naval or military service of the United States at some time during the period between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, both dates inclusive, or served in the military or naval services of any of the Governments associated with the United States during the Great War, who were citizens of the United States at the time of enlistment.

"SEC. 6. The organization shall be nonpolitical and, as an organization, shall not promote the candidacy of any person seeking public office.

"SEC. 7. Said corporation may acquire any or all the assets of the existing unincorporated national organization known as the American Legion upon discharging or satisfactorily providing for the payment and discharge of all its liabilities.

"SEC. 8. Said corporation and its State and local subdivisions shall have the sole and exclusive right to have and to use in carrying out its purposes, the name the 'American Legion': Provided, That nothing in this act shall interfere or conflict with established or vested rights.

"SEC. 9. The said corporation shall, on or before the 1st day of January in each year, make and transmit to the Congress a report of its proceedings for the preceding calendar year, including a full and complete report of its receipts and expenditures: Provided, however, That said report shall not be printed as public documents.

"SEC. 10. The right to repeal, alter, or amend this act at any time is hereby expressly reserved."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, this bill is H. R. 6808, introduced by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. It is entitled "A bill to incorporate the American Legion." This is a unanimous report from the committee. In the consideration of the bill by the committee there was no opposition to the bill. All were in favor of the passage of the bill. Many amendments were proposed. Most of them made no material change in the measure. But the amendments changed the phraseology or verbiage of the bill; so much so that we concluded to strike out all in the bill after the enacting clause and insert a new one entirely. And yet we did not materially change the bill. It contains all the main features of the original bill.

All of you know something about the American Legion, an organization of the American soldiers who fought in the Great World War. A meeting was held in France at which the organization was first instituted. Subsequently, after very general advertisement throughout the entire United States, a meeting was held in St. Louis which was largely attended, and there a temporary organization was formed. And under that temporary national organization State organizations have been formed, I think, in all of the States of the Union.

The one question that arose at the beginning was this: Ordinarily organizations incorporated by acts of Congress are made corporations of the District of Columbia. This kind of a provision was in the original bill. We decided we would make this a national corporation with its headquarters at any place it chose to have them. We therefore omitted the words declaring it should be a corporation of the District of Columbia. Some question arose as to the object and purpose of this organization as set forth in the original bill.

It seemed to the committee that the object and purpose, as expressed in the bill as it was introduced, were too broad and comprehensive. The committee bill very much restricts the object and purpose of the bill as was originally proposed. Under the original bill certain persons named in the bill were made a corporate body. We concluded that under the terms of the original bill those persons would be the corporation and would have absolute power to name their successors. We thought that would not be right; so under the form as we have presented it we authorized the delegates to the next national convention, which is to be held at Minneapolis on November 11, to participate in the permanent organization of the body.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MORGAN. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Oklahoma to the bill with reference to the statement which he has just made. He says that all members will be permitted to participate in the convention, to be held, I think, in November, and I think he said at Minneapolis.

Mr. MORGAN. On November 11.

Mr. DYER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to page 7, and see whether or not he does not agree with me that there should be an amendment there. At the end of the names on page 7, where appears the name of George H. Wood, of Ohio, a well-known soldier and a well-known politician, these words appear:

And such persons as may be chosen.

Now, if the gentleman understands the English language, as I think he does, and I am sure he does, he would agree with me that no one can participate in the organization or be governor, or whatever you may call them, unless they are chosen, and by whom? By the gentlemen whose names are mentioned in this bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, if the gentleman will observe, it says "and such persons as may be chosen."

Mr. DYER. Who is going to choose them?

Mr. MORGAN. It says further:

Who are members of the "American Legion," an unincorporated patriotic society of the soldiers, sailors, and marines.

And so forth.

Now, then, in section 2 it says:

That said persons named in section 1 and such other persons——

Mr. DYER. "As may be selected."

Mr. MORGAN. Please let me get through—as may be selected, are hereby authorized to meet to complete the organization of said corporation by the selection of officers, the adoption of a constitution and by-laws, and by the doing of all other things necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act, at which meeting any person duly accredited as a delegate from any local or State organization of the existing unincorporated organization known as the "American Legion" shall be permitted to participate in the proceedings thereof.

The committee has tried so far as it could to incorporate language there so that not only every State organization but every local post in the United States is authorized to send a delegate to this national convention. All these delegates may participate in perfecting the organization.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MORGAN. For a short question.

Mr. DYER. It is upon this very point that I think the House wants information, if we can get it to them.

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. DYER. Now, the words on page 7 to which I have invited the gentleman's attention, "and such persons as may be chosen," and then further down, in section 2, "and such other persons as may be selected," have no other purpose in this bill than to put into the hands of a few men and a few others whom they choose the right to perpetuate and to run and to handle the organization without regard to the membership at large.

I know something about this kind of organization. I have been a member and at one time the head of a war organization composed of soldiers of the Spanish War. I know something about such organizations, and I know there is a tendency on the part of those sometimes who start these organizations to so arrange it that they can continuously perpetuate it and control it regardless of the membership at large. If it stays in the bill, gentlemen, this organization will not be what it ought to be, an organization for all the men who served in this war, but will have for its purpose, I am afraid, the keeping of certain men in office permanently.

Mr. MORGAN. I can not yield further.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman wanted information, and that is the fact.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say, so far as the committee is concerned, we have endeavored to broaden this language and put in language which will clearly give every post, every State organization, the right to send delegates to participate in the permanent organization. The committee, I am sure, of which my friend from Missouri is a very honorable, active, and able member, will be glad if he can substitute some phraseology that will make that point clear. I am sure the committee and the House will be glad to accept it.

Mr. HOWARD and Mr. MILLER rose.

Mr. MORGAN. I will yield first to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. I would like to inquire how these original incorporators were selected. Were they appointed by somebody representing the great mass of American soldiers to ask for this corporation, or are they just voluntary?

Mr. MORGAN. The meeting at St. Louis appointed a committee which consisted, I think, of 34 members and authorized them to secure, if possible, the passage of a bill through the Congress incorporating the organization.

Mr. HOWARD. And this list of names includes that committee?

Mr. MORGAN. I think so.

Mr. HOWARD. And they represent the legion?

Mr. MORGAN. They do.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I will.

Mr. MILLER. I think we all are in favor of this bill or some similar bill; but I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows of any other corporations of this same general class and with this same general purpose, that are national in character, that will probably subsequently appeal to the committee and to this House for a similar incorporation?

Mr. MORGAN. I will say that there is one bill pending before the Committee on the Judiciary providing for the incorporation of an organization, I think, under the name of "World War Veterans."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Is it the disposition of the committee to likewise incorporate that corporation and all subsequent ones that may be organized? If not, I can see very clearly the advantage of being early in the contest here for the obtaining of these articles of incorporation.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not authorized to speak from that standpoint, but the gentleman from Ohio appeared before the committee yesterday and we discussed the bill to which I refer, which I believe he introduced by request. We found that the members of that organization were confined largely to northern Ohio. But we did not pass upon that proposition. We will have to pass upon these propositions as they come.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion, it seems to me the difficulty that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] raises might be obviated very easily by pointing out how the Grand Army of the Republic and the Confederate Veterans' Association keep up their organizations, because they have succeeded, both of them.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I will state to the gentleman that the Grand Army of the Republic——

Mr. DYER. If the gentleman will yield for a moment, I want to answer the question which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] referred to.

Mr. MORGAN. One minute. I will state that the Grand Army of the Republic has never been incorporated. I have heard statements made here this morning to the effect that Congress refused to incorporate the Grand Army of the Republic. But I have read carefully the RECORD, and I have a copy of it here, and I find that Congress did not refuse to incorporate the Grand Army of the Republic. A bill for that purpose passed the Senate and came to the House and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the Committee on the Judiciary reported it favorably to the House.

It came up on a unanimous-consent day, and was discussed somewhat, and after a somewhat lengthy discussion, as usual on account of various reasons, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objected to the consideration of the bill at that time. It was nearly at the close of a session, and the bill was never passed by the House. But it was passed by the Senate; it was reported favorably by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, but it never was acted upon by the House.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All I was interested in was to get rid of this difficulty that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] raised—how this corporation is to be perpetuated.

Mr. MORGAN. I will yield now to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], and I ask the gentleman from Missouri to take heed to what he says.

Mr. DYER. I will say that no other organizations of soldiers and sailors and marines of any war in which we have been engaged has ever been incorporated by the Congress of the United States. This is the first attempt, and no doubt if we set the precedent we will not only be requested by these other organizations to grant incorporations, but out of the war just ended there may be 12 or 15 such organizations growing up in addition to this one, and we shall be called upon, gentlemen, to incorporate these others. If we are going to set a precedent, let us write it in such a way that there will be no complaint in the future, because this bill ought not to pass as it is written. There should be some material change.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes more.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. MORGAN. Give me 10 minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There are quite a number of others who want time.

Mr. MORGAN. All right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. KING. I am in favor of a bill of this kind. I was very much interested in the statement the gentleman made when he took the floor, to the effect that the purpose here is not to incorporate this organization as a District of Columbia corporation, but to incorporate it as an organization of national character. How under the Constitution do you manage to make it a national corporation?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is the way all of these corporations by Congress are made.

Mr. KING. I thought they were organizations within the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They are generally incorporated as incorporations in the District of Columbia.

Mr. KING. What did the gentleman mean when he said he was making it a national corporation?

Mr. MORGAN. It would not be a corporation of the District of Columbia and maintain offices here. It could have its headquarters and chief office in New York or San Francisco, or anywhere else within the United States. It would be national in the sense that it would not be a State, Territorial, or District corporation.

Mr. KING. Would not this be setting a precedent for a lot of other corporations that are desiring to organize on a national basis?

Mr. MORGAN. It may be setting a precedent, but the members of the committee believe that this organization, composed of the men who constituted the Army and Navy of the United States in the great World War, is of such a character——

Mr. KING. I agreed to that——

Mr. MORGAN. And would have such an influence upon the future welfare of this country, in the advancement of the character of its citizenship and the preservation of the ideals of this Nation, that Congress could well afford to give it an incorporation of a national character.

Mr. CRAGO. It has refused to do that with respect to the veterans of every other war.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not think so. As I have pointed out, Congress did not refuse to incorporate the Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. What percentage of these incorporators are commissioned officers and what percentage are privates?

Mr. MORGAN. The hearings show just what positions these men occupied. A good percentage of them are privates. Perhaps the majority of them are officers. But we have a list showing just what position in the Army each one occupied. It is fairly well divided up, as I remember it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What particular benefit would this institution get from being incorporated, inasmuch as all these other societies following other wars seem to have accomplished their object without it?

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I do not know that I could enumerate those benefits. The Grand Army of the Republic applied for national incorporation. I understand from some members of the Spanish-American veterans that they would have applied for a national incorporation long ago if they had thought that Congress would incorporate them. The American Legion desires to incorporate.

The members of the organization have good reasons for wanting to incorporate. They want to publish a paper or a magazine. They have funds, and it is a proper thing that their property should have some organization that could hold it legally.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Well, but all these other institutions of the same kind—the Grand Army of the Republic, the United Confederate Veterans, the United Spanish War Veterans, and similar patriotic bodies—have been able to conduct their business during periods of time ranging from half a century down to twenty-odd years without any such legal protection.

Mr. MORGAN. That is true.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How do we apply a national charter of incorporation in jurisdictions which under the Constitution are under the control of the different States? We have jurisdiction over the District of Columbia, and very likely over any Territory, but how are we going to enter a State and grant jurisdiction to corporations within a State when the State laws provide the way in which incorporation may be had in that State?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not understand the purport of the gentleman's question.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How can we create a national incorporation in a place where we have no territorial jurisdiction in which that corporation can work? We have no such jurisdiction except in the District of Columbia and in the Territories, which are under the jurisdiction of Congress.

Mr. MORGAN. It can work wherever the laws of the United States are in force.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; but that presumes that the law is a constitutional law. Where in the Constitution do we get authority?

Mr. MORGAN. I have a decision here from the Supreme Court of the United States which, I think, shows that we have that authority, but I have not the time now to read it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Congress has been incorporating things here for the last 10 years.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But they are localized to the District of Columbia, are they not?

Mr. MORGAN. The Judiciary Committee has given the bill careful consideration. Congress has frequently incorporated societies, organizations, and institutions for various objects and purposes. None of them has been more worthy than the American Legion. This organization is composed of soldiers, sailors, and marines who comprised our Army and Navy in the great World War. It is highly appropriate that Congress should grant this national charter to these men in recognition of the great service they have already rendered and to aid them in the good work of future years.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, every Member of this Congress is anxious to do any and every thing that is right and reasonable in honor of the men who fought and won the Great War with Germany. We want to do what is right; we want to be kind and considerate and generous to those men. But here we have a proposition providing for the incorporation, not of the American soldiers, sailors, and marines who fought that war, but we have a proposition here to incorporate certain men into what is known as the American Legion. Their names are set out here, probably two dozen or so men whose names are set out as the incorporators of the American Legion. And mark you, it does not say "and all other soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Great War who are or who may become members of the American Legion." It does not say that. It does not provide in this bill that all the soldiers, sailors, and marines who become members of the American Legion are to be a part of this incorporation by the Congress of the United States. It says, on page 7, that these men whose names are written here, some of them active politicians in some of the States, "and such other persons as may be selected" are authorized to meet and complete the organization. Gentlemen of the House, I ask you how these other men are to be selected? Shall they be chosen in a national encampment where delegates assemble from all parts of the United States, or shall they be chosen by the men whose names are set out here? I say to you that from my experience in organizations of this kind, the men who are chosen to sit with these gentlemen whose names are mentioned will be chosen by them, and they will manage the affairs of the American Legion. They will be the corporation.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. No; not now. There will be delegates coming to the encampment from all over the United States, but the part that they shall play in the encampment, the part that they shall play in the management of this organization, will be determined by the men whose names are written here as the incorporators. It is plain and evident that it is not intended that the American Legion which we are proposing to incorporate shall consist of all honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Great War, and that they shall have equal consideration and an equal right and an equal voice in this organization. No; it is intended by this organization as written here to permit a few men to control this organization and to perpetuate themselves in office, whoever they may be, for all time to come if they wish; because in section 2, in order to show that the words in section 1 are not an oversight, it goes on and says further that the persons named in section 1 and such other persons as may be selected are hereby authorized to meet and complete the organization. It does not say that all honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines who are elected members of the American Legion shall meet in Minneapolis and perfect the organization. You may send delegates from Tennessee or Ohio or Missouri up there, but when they go to Minneapolis and attempt to participate in the perfection of this organization they will find that these incorporators and such other men as they have selected will do the work.

Now, gentlemen, the Congress of the United States has never in its history passed any legislation of this kind before affecting men who have fought for their country.

I am not making that as a point, but if we are to do it, if we are to establish here a precedent, if we are to permit the incorporation under the Constitution of the United States of an organization of this kind, let us not have it said afterwards that we were responsible in permitting a few men to perpetuate and control the American Legion for their own benefit or for any other improper motive. I do not charge that it would be done, but there is danger in it. Let us stand up now and protect the rights of all the soldiers who become members of the American Legion.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri as to the location of this corporation. What is its situs?

Mr. DYER. Where its place of business is?

Mr. GARRETT. No. I am not making myself clear. A corporation in certain ways is a citizen either of a State or of the District of Columbia. This bill does not provide a situs. It may sue and be sued, but where—in a Federal court or in a State court?

Mr. DYER. There is no provision in this bill touching that. It does not say where. In the past corporations having a national charter have been incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia largely, so that they would have their headquarters here, so that they might be reached.

Mr. GARRETT. The distinction is very clear. You must give a corporation situs, a residence, unless you intend to make it a corporation above all law—that is, all State law or all District law.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman's point, of course, is well taken, because this bill does not fix any place where it can be sued. There is nothing in the bill to that effect. It goes on and says the organization can own, use, dispose of such real estate and personal property, and so forth. I do not know of any organization that we have incorporated in the past that is just like this. The powers given under this proposed article are very broad, and if we were giving the privilege equally to all the men and women who become members of the American Legion I would not be here entering a protest, but you are proposing to put this organization into the hands of a few men who may perpetuate themselves.

Mr. GARRETT. Section 6 provides that the organization shall be nonpolitical, and as an organization shall not promote the candidacy of any person seeking public office. Can the gentleman tell me what the Judiciary Committee had in mind when it put that provision in?

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman that this bill was not written by the Judiciary Committee in the first instance. It was prepared and sent to the Judiciary Committee, and a subcommittee of which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is chairman reported the bill as it is here now on the calendar of the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. I desire to inquire of the Speaker and the chairman of the committee in respect to the apportionment of the time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] for one hour and some member of the minority of the Judiciary Committee for another hour.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman from Minnesota intend to use his entire hour consecutively?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; if anyone desires to take time on the other side, I would be very glad to have him do it. I am willing to yield now to anyone.

Mr. GARD. I desire to be heard upon the bill and would like to know when I may be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman now.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is a matter of entire indifference to me, and I suspect it is a matter of equal indifference to the Members of the House, who are named as the incorporators of what is called the American Legion, but it is a matter of most supreme importance for us to know that this organization, an organization of soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Great War, is absolutely open in its enrollment to every honorably discharged soldier, sailor, and marine. [Applause.] If the United States of America is to abandon its traditional policy of not incorporating assemblies of this kind, then the Congress should know and the people of the United States should know that this is not a selected or hand-picked assembly, but that it is absolutely open to every man who saw honorable service as a soldier, sailor, or marine in the Great War. With that understanding, I am sure there will be no opposition to this bill.

In discussing the bill a statement was made a moment ago that the Committee on the Judiciary did not write the bill. I am compelled to contend that that statement is erroneous. The bill was entirely rewritten by a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary and when reported to the full committee changed in a very great many respects, so that the bill as it is now written contains the sentiment of the Judiciary Committee as expressed by the striking out of the entire original bill and the substituting of that which the Committee on the Judiciary did. In so saying I am entirely sensible that the collective minds of the Members of this House may be more valuable in expression than the minds of the members of the Judiciary Committee, and therefore I for one, as a member of the committee, would welcome the suggestion of any Member of this House toward the enlargement in a legal way of carrying out what the House wants to do, and that is to afford high honor to every honorably discharged American soldier, sailor, and marine in the so-called Great War.

Mr. HULINGS and Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana rose.

Mr. GARD. I yield first to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman's sentiments are entirely correct, but would not all that he mentions be accomplished and at the same time meet the objection of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] if, on the eighth page, in line 3, there were inserted the words "shall be a member of such corporation and entitled to participate in the proceedings thereof"?

Mr. GARD. I have certain amendments which I desire to speak of in a moment, and I would be very glad to consider the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I yield now to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, what is the necessity for this measure in any way? Have we not now in this country organizations of various kinds of men who fought in other wars who have associated themselves together in their own way and by their own methods? Have any of them come to Congress and asked for a charter or asked to be incorporated? I refer specifically to the Grand Army of the Republic, to the United Confederate Veterans, to the Veterans of the Spanish-American War, and so forth. Have they ever asked for such an incorporation as this?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that some of the organizations which the gentleman has referred to did ask for articles of incorporation. I believe there is now a Federal incorporation known as the Society de Santiago, which includes some members of the Spanish-American War. There is no general incorporation of the Spanish-American War Veterans. There was some time ago, many years after the close of the Civil War, an effort made to incorporate the Grand Army of the Republic, but this incorporation never was carried out. But the splendid and honorable purpose of the Grand Army of the Republic, the purpose of every kindred military organization which has gallantly borne American arms to victory, has been substantially carried out by the existing law, and as I look at it myself I think that everything which this American Legion could do can be done without this Federal incorporation. But, as I say, if we do decide, and the Congress has a right to decide, to give this organization a corporate status, then we should do it well knowing what we do and incorporate it in such a way that we do not select a body of individuals who may act to the discouragement of other bodies of individuals who have had service in this Great War. My own apprehension about this matter is, and it is a sincere apprehension based upon what I assume to be the law of the United States, that the correct policy of the Congress is not to assume the powers of the States by giving incorporation. I am opposed, except in extraordinary cases, to the granting of Federal incorporation of those things belonging to the States or in the United States. When the United States wants incorporation it does not come to Congress to get it but goes to the State of Kentucky or some other State and gets a State incorporation to do a national work. Now, we may be confronted with other military organizations coming here. For instance, there is a bill to incorporate the American World War Veterans or some similarly named organization. We know also of other organizations of different names coming here asking to be incorporated. If this organization is to be incorporated, then we should play fair. We should incorporate, as we do this, other honest associations of honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines to which the Federal incorporation is necessary.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman, of course, knows from the hearings, and so forth, that this organization has not as yet held a national encampment or convention. They are to hold one this fall. Does not the gentleman think at any rate that it would be better for us to wait and act upon this bill after they have had a regular delegated meeting and taken action touching such things?

Mr. GARD. I think the legal status of the matter is this: Under the law we are compelled in the establishment of a corporation to do what the State does, what the individual State does, to select a certain number of persons to act as incorporators.

These are the persons who arrange the preliminary steps of incorporation. It is at best a technical thing to make necessary compliance with the law to have a selection of incorporators. Therefore I say it is a matter of indifference to me who are selected so long as when they are selected they are representative of the body.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield? I want to ask a question on that point.

Mr. DYER. My point was these men are not properly representative of the great body of the members who served in the war, because they have not had a convention to which they were delegated.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I do not yield just now. I desire to be courteous to all Members; I will yield in a moment.

Mr. STEVENSON. It was in reference to the matter the gentleman is now discussing.

Mr. GARD. The first thing, therefore, in the creation of a corporation is the creation of a number of incorporators. Now, there may be 5, 10, or 100, or more, so that it matters little who they are or what they are so long as they are fairly representative of their class. Now, the next thing we have to do is to select a place of residence. I agree with the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] that this bill should be limited to an incorporation in and for the District of Columbia, because I assume that the Congress of the United States has unlimited power to legislate for the District of Columbia, and I do not believe that we are above the law or above anything which we have heretofore guaranteed to the States, nor can we assume to ourselves the entire sweeping of the decks, so far as State action is concerned, in a matter of any of these incorporations.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. I do not yield at this time; pardon me. Therefore I shall offer an amendment to include, on page 7, line 17, after the words "body corporate," the words "within or of the District of Columbia." I do that for the purpose of establishing a proper residence, and I think it is necessary. It was in the original bill. It was so recognized by those who had the original bill in charge at the time it came to the Committee on the Judiciary. It was in the bill when presented by Representative JOHNSON of South Dakota, and I think it is a proper matter to be contained in a bill considered by this body.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will for a question.

Mr. MORGAN. I would like to state just briefly——

Mr. GARD. I yield for a question; I do not yield for a statement, because the gentleman has plenty of time.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like the gentleman to state his reasons why he thinks it ought to be done. I did not get the reasons why he wanted to confine it to the District of Columbia.

Mr. GARD. My reason is this, namely, that I contend that under the Constitution of the United States there are certain delegated powers to the States. Among them is the creation of corporations, and when the United States incorporates it should take the territory over which it has unquestioned authority, to wit, the District of Columbia, and incorporate within that territory. If this is incorporated in the District of Columbia, you will have an office here, you will have a central place, you will have every reason for the identification of the corporation here in the Capital City and every right which can possibly be extended to the American Legion.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the gentleman think the Congress has the authority or constitutional power to create a corporation except in that way? Is that his position?

Mr. GARD. No; I do not say that.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I yield for a question upon that point.

Mr. GARRETT. It is upon that same point. However, it is not in the form of a question. It seems to me that the Congress has power to create a Federal corporation when that corporation is to do for the Government that which the Government can do directly. But beyond that it can not go. There is not involved in the bill before the House a proposition to perform governmental functions. Therefore if this should pass without giving to the corporation a situs in the District of Columbia and it should be questioned in the courts the incorporators would have the trouble for their pains, because it could not stand the test of judicial decision.

Mr. GARD. I desire to yield now to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to make an inquiry as to the question that the gentleman was discussing a moment ago as to the selection of the incorporators. The selection of the incorporators is by name, and they add on "and such persons who may be chosen who are members of the 'American Legion,' an unincorporated patriotic society of the soldiers, sailors, and marines," and so forth. Now, who are to choose them? There is not a provision as to who is to choose those additional members. Has the gentleman any information on that?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I have. I am glad the gentleman asked about that. In addition to what I have said about my own idea as to the propriety of limiting this to a corporation in and for the District of Columbia—and I am convinced that it should be done legally that way—certain questions are asked by gentlemen concerning the personnel of the incorporators and the extent of the membership. I have framed an amendment to which I would like the Members of the House to give heed, because in my examination of the bill, which I saw for the first time to-day after it came from the committee, it seems to me there should be some change in section 2. Section 2 provides:

That said persons named in section 1 and such other persons as may be selected are hereby authorized to meet to complete the organization of said corporation by the selection of officers, the adoption of a constitution—

And so forth. The word "selected," as it appears on page 7, line 20, is not connected with any clause or qualification or explanation, but stands alone by itself—"persons as may be selected." The amendment which I have in mind, and which I submit for the respectful consideration of the membership of the House, is that after the word "selected" there should be this language:

From among the membership of the American Legion, an unincorporated patriotic society of the soldiers and sailors and marines of the Great War of 1917–18.

In other words, what I would add would be that all persons who are members of this present unincorporated society known as the "American Legion" should be permitted to assemble at Minneapolis on November 11, 1919, the calendar year following the signing of the armistice in the Great War, and they should all meet there on a basis of equal representation.

In other words, whether a man be selected as an incorporator or whether he be the most humble member of this so-called "American Legion," he would have the right to appear there at this convention and cast his vote, have his voice heard in the matter of the organization of the corporation, the selection of officers, the adoption of a constitution and by-laws, and in doing the other things necessary to the creation of this organization.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MORGAN. Do you mean that any individual soldier could appear at that convention and participate in that organization? That is what you suggest?

Mr. GARD. I did not suggest it. I said my amendment was that persons that might be selected from among the membership of the American Legion could participate.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the gentleman mean as delegates or as plain members?

Mr. GARD. Delegates to this convention to be held in Minneapolis.

Mr. MORGAN. That is all right.

Mr. GARD. It is apparent—and I am sure the gentleman will agree with me—that there are two propositions, one the way the incorporation would be followed by the selection of delegates to this convention in Minneapolis. The convention in Minneapolis, composed of delegates, as all conventions are, then must act toward the formation of this organization known as the "American Legion." They make by-laws, rules, and regulations, and they provide for the elements of admission and continuance of the membership of this organization known as the "American Legion," and what I want to do is to make this big enough and broad enough to not be limited in any way, but to afford entrance, if anybody wants to enter it, and the protection that may accrue, to all honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines.

Mr. MORGAN. I think that is right. I thought the gentleman was contending for persons who were not delegates.

Mr. GARD. There is a provision, I take it, for the selection of delegates and to provide for the organization and the carrying out of the organization after it is made, and section 2 provides for the selection of delegates, but I think that word "selected" should be qualified so that the members who are selected should be among the membership of the American Legion.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to inquire of the gentleman as to the purport of section 9, which provides that this corporation is to make a full and complete report to Congress and provides that the report shall not be printed as a public document. What did the committee have in view?

Mr. GARD. I will be frank and say to the gentleman that there was some apprehension, in which I did not share, that this report, if printed, would be circulated in such a way as to impede the office of the Public Printer. And it was therefore thought that by making the report to Congress, and by putting in the words that it should not be printed as a public document, it would not be entitled to the franking privilege and therefore not sent broadcast over the country.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. GARD. I do not share in the apprehension of those. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. MILLER. What general purpose did the committee have in mind by the compelling of this organization to report to Congress?

Mr. GARD. The committee did not seek to compel the report of this organization. The organization itself, as represented by the proponents of it, said they desired to make a report. And I myself think that every time the United States of America vests a corporate capacity in a number of persons it should have a yearly report of its officers.

Mr. MILLER. One question further.

Mr. GARD. Surely.

Mr. MILLER. I believe that the original bill provides that the report shall be made to the War Department, and then the auditors pass upon it, and then they transmit that to Congress.

Mr. GARD. Well, I think that is an entirely unnecessary provision. I think if the report is made to Congress, and it comes here to Congress, so that the people of the United States may see what it is, then the necessary safeguard which the Congress of the United States should impose is placed upon this bill.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter, and I think we ought to have more Members present, especially certain gentlemen who generally insist on the rest of us staying here; and therefore I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is obvious that there is no quorum present.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this call 285 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to suspend further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] had the floor.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I was going to ask the gentleman from Ohio what he thought of an amendment on lines 12, 13, and 14, in the first section of the amendment on page 7, which would strike out the lines after the word "Ohio" down to the word "soldiers" and insert in lieu thereof "and all other honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Great War, 1917–18, known as the 'American Legion,' are hereby created and declared to be a body corporate." In other words, that would incorporate not only those persons whose names are especially mentioned, but it would also add the names of every other honorably discharged soldier, sailor, or marine.

I want to invite attention to the fact that the representation in this meeting is provided for in section 2, and all of those who are added to the corporation, of course, would not be permitted to attend the meeting on November 11, but the delegates of that meeting would be selected as provided in subsequent sections.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I am sensible of the good purpose that the gentleman seeks to effect by his amendment, but I do not think it a proper amendment as suggested, for this reason: The names, beginning with "William S. Beam" and ending with "George H. Wood," are names of persons selected as incorporators, and I do not think it advisable or wise in the making of legislation to add the extremity of the membership of that which may be called the "American Legion." In other words, when we make the incorporation, it is necessary to name a number of persons as incorporators. The usual way is to say, "John Smith, John Jones, John Robinson, and their successors"; but in this case it was thought proper by the committee to possibly include in the incorporators such other named persons as might be selected from the membership of this American Legion. But I would not think it necessary or proper as a legislative proposition to include in the list of incorporators all members of the so-called American Legion. It would be too cumbersome for its own proper procedure.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. In the end does it not contemplate that all the soldiers, sailors, and marines who join local posts will be members of this corporation?

Mr. GARD. I suppose it does. That is a matter for the organization of the American Legion.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will further yield, my suggested amendment did not contemplate the elimination of these names, but it meant the addition of other soldiers, sailors, and marines.

Mr. GARD. I think the addition is too great to be incorporated as a legislative proposition.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman will see that you add other names to the list, but those other names are of such persons as may be selected, whereas the amendment which I have suggested would simply make all honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines at once, without any selection, members of this corporation, without any distinction.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I had about concluded what I wanted to say on this subject. I have no desire to consume a great deal of time except to explain.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to one more question?

Mr. REED of West Virginia rose.

Mr. GARD. Does the chairman of the committee desire me to yield to him?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No.

Mr. GARD. I yield, if I may, to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of West Virginia. On this subject of the incorporators, since this is to be a national incorporation and we want to carry its enthusiasm to every State in the Union, why should we not at least be permitted to add an incorporator from each State in the Union? In this list of incorporators some States have four or five and some none.

Mr. GARD. You may do that; certainly.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Do you object to it?

Mr. GARD. I have no objection; and I am free to say that the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] has an amendment which seeks to carry that purpose, or some part of it, into effect. As I have already explained, it is a matter of indifference to me who the incorporators are to be, except that I want them to express fairly their representation as a class.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. GARD. In other words, to represent properly the body of soldiers, sailors, and marines.

Mr. Speaker, during the calling of the roll the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], who is a very good lawyer, called my attention to the constitutional debates in which Mr. Madison contended that Congress should have the power to grant charters of incorporation in cases where the public good may require them or where a single State may be incompetent. Mr. Pinckney contended that Congress should have power to grant charters of incorporation. These two propositions were submitted to what was called at that time the committee on detail, and were never afterwards heard of; so that it is apparent that in the consideration of the Constitution and the formation of those elements which the fathers of the Constitution deemed should belong to the Federal Government the power of incorporation was not considered to be a strictly Federal power. In other words, you might go to this extreme: If we say here that we eliminate the District of Columbia as a residence of the corporation, and say that we grant this to the whole United States, then we might equally say that Congress could have the power to grant an article of incorporation in the State of Illinois, or the State of Mississippi, and no other State; and everybody knows that that would not only be futile but entirely not in accord with the principles of our Constitution. Then, too, if something should arise in a Federal corporation whereby the Congress of the United States should desire to take issue with the management of the corporation, it is entirely in the interest of good legislation to have a permanent residence and not have a roaming residence all over the United States of America, since a possible defense might be made to misconduct in the corporate body that the Congress not having mentioned the place where the corporation lived, not having given it a local residence, it did so without any power, and therefore there would be none of the controlling power of Congress left in the law,

I venture these observations in support of the amendment I have offered, that there should be a limitation of this to the District of Columbia. I have other amendments, one of which I read, regarding the selection of delegates, intended to carry out what I think everybody wants to carry out, and that is to give to every man who saw honorable service in the Great War which resulted in the overthrow of autocracy in the world—we hope for all time to come—to give to every such man who marched forth to victory under the American flag an opportunity to enroll in this patriotic organization.

Mr. DYER. Before the gentleman sits down, will he yield for one question?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I do not desire to use any more time, but I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DYER. I just want to ask this question: If the Congress should grant this incorporation, would the incorporators then be permitted to adopt by-laws, and in their by-laws could they discriminate as to the membership? In other words, could they do what I understand it is their intention to do—prevent negro soldiers from becoming members? Would they be permitted in their by-laws to do that?

Mr. GARD. I can not answer that, except to say that section 2 provides that this organization may adopt a constitution and by-laws.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman is a very good lawyer, and I would be very glad to have his opinion on that, whether or not they could in their by-laws say that only white soldiers, sailors, and marines should become members.

Mr. GARD. That is entirely a question which should be addressed to the organization and not to Congress.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I occupied?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 25 minutes remaining.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate, having proceeded in pursuance of the Constitution to reconsider the bill (H. R. 3854) entitled "An act for the repeal of the daylight-saving law," returned to the House of Representatives by the President of the United States, with his objections, and sent by the House of Representatives to the Senate with the message of the President returning the bill—

Resolved, That the bill do pass, two-thirds of the Senate agreeing to pass the same.

TO INCORPORATE THE AMERICAN LEGION.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I happen to be a member of this organization, and I can give you what experience I have had as a simple member. I did not know that this bill was pending nor do I know how these incorporators were selected. As to the doubt expressed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], I want to say that it is absolutely open to all who served in the Army or Navy during the recent war. I also want to say that it is open to all soldiers regardless of color, and right here in Washington there is a camp called "Europe Camp," I think, named in honor of a colored soldier, which is composed of colored ex-soldiers.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman state whether or not the gentlemen who are seeking this incorporation have adopted any by-laws so far?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That I do not know. I belong to George Washington Post. I think we are working under some sort of temporary by-laws. I am not an officer. I do not expect to be an officer as long as I am in Congress, and I am just one in the ranks.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman used the words "all people of whatever race they may be." Did the gentleman get that from the bill or from the form of the organization?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am stating as to existing facts now.

Mr. JONES of Texas. This bill does not say that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It says that no one shall be eligible who has not served in the naval or military service. It does not say anyone shall be privileged.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Right there, in order that there may be no doubt, I may propose the following amendment, if it is necessary. On page 9, after the word "enlistment," in line 11, add:

Provided, That any person who served in the naval or military services of the United States as herein provided shall be entitled to membership of said corporation.

I feel that there will be no discrimination, and perhaps the amendment may not be necessary.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Then under the gentleman's amendment if adopted a negro or a member of any other race who served in the naval or military forces could become a member of this organization regardless of the desire of the local camp?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly.

Mr. JONES of Texas. In other words, no local camp can keep them from joining that local camp regardless of what race they belong to?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have not taken an active part in reference to this organization, but I know of no case where an honorably discharged soldier or sailor has been denied admission. Now, in reference to the fears of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] as to these incorporators perpetuating themselves in office, I can submit that this organization is composed of the best blood of this country, live wires, every one of them, and there is not any group of men who will ever be able to get complete control of this organization and keep it, not unless all the rest of us are dopes, and I assure you we are not. No group of men will be able to control this organization for their own interest and no matter who the incorporators are they will not be able to perpetuate themselves in office.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will.

Mr. SEARS. As I understand the bill, certain men are named to be at the head of this organization?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Who are at the head?

Mr. SEARS. These men are to select such other men as they want.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Simply as incorporators.

Mr. SEARS. As incorporators, and then in section 5 these men selected can blackball so as to keep out any other——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, no.

Mr. SEARS. They can.

Mr. DYER. The language is plain.

Mr. SEARS. "No person shall be a member of this organization unless he served in the naval or military service." It does not say he shall be a member——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That can be provided for. I assure the gentleman the present spirit of the organization would tolerate no discrimination.

Mr. SEARS. You are going to provide for that?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am willing to offer an amendment. I am willing to make any change that leaves this open to all soldiers and sailors who served in this last war.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that it would be much better to leave that question with the local camp, rather than bind the organization by an amendment which required them to accept any man who served, regardless of whether they desired him in that local camp or not?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Under ordinary circumstances it would, but when they come in here and ask for a national charter, then they must leave it open to everybody.

Mr. DYER. That is it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All of this talk about the original incorporators perpetuating themselves is absolutely futile. All this bill does is that you have to have some names to found a corporation on, and this bill provides that they shall adopt a constitution and by-laws. Well, now, it is absurd to assume that four and a half millions of soldiers have not got strength enough and sense enough to change these incorporators whenever they desire to do so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We will take care of that; there is no danger of that at all.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. BEE. Is there not another organization called a legion, composed entirely of privates, noncommissioned men, enlisted men, and not officers?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This organization is not limited——

Mr. BEE. Is there not now one in existence?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I understand there is one called the World War Veterans.

Mr. BEE. Will they come here asking for a charter also?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, they have a right to ask it at any time.

Mr. BEE. How many more are coming to ask for a charter?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am in favor of making this sufficiently broad to embrace all.

Mr. BEE. Suppose these other people want to maintain their own organization, will they not have the right to ask Congress to incorporate them?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Everybody has a right to ask Congress. I hope we will not be making more acts of incorporation, because personally I do not like them.

Mr. DYER. I would like to say myself that out of the few men and the short service in the Spanish-American War there were six or seven organizations.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Finally they got all together.

Mr. DYER. No.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Are they not finally all together?

Mr. DYER. No; there are several organizations now.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I thought they were united under the Spanish War Veterans.

Mr. LITTLE. I belong to two of them myself.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I did not know that. What we are trying to do, what the rank and file is trying to do, is to embrace all ex soldiers, sailors, and marines in this one corporation.

Why the necessity of this particular corporation I do not know. I did not know that it was proposed.

Mr. DYER. Is it the intention to include privates in this organization?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Why, we have more privates than officers.

Mr. DYER. I call attention to the names in the bill who seek incorporation. I find but two privates among them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is the gentleman personally acquainted with all of these men?

Mr. DYER. I have the hearings here.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I did not know that.

Mr. DYER. Most of them are brigadier generals and colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains, and so on.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I guess there are not many generals. In this organization we have no title; everyone is known as comrade; we wear no uniform at the meetings, and it is absolutely democratic in every way.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. At the initial meeting held in St. Louis there was not the slightest attempt to bar out privates.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I know that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There were more privates in that convention than officers.

Mr. DYER. I was present, and I doubt the correctness of my colleague's impression.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I was not present, but I know all about what happened.

Mr. DYER. I was there.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will invite any gentleman to the next meeting of the George Washington Post, and he will then see that the enlisted men outnumber the officers five to one, as they naturally would. There is no intention to make this exclusively an officers' organization. It would be absurd to do that.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes,

Mr. BEE. Did the convention that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] refers to at St. Louis recommend this incorporation? Did this grow out of that convention?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; that is exactly what was done. That was the first meeting in the United States taking place toward the organization of the soldiers of the Great War. They appointed committees there, and they afterwards met in New York, and they had to have some kind of machinery to start with, and they picked out sufficient names for the foundation for a corporation.

Mr. BEE. Did this incorporation here grow from a St. Louis meeting?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; directly out of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I was a member of the subcommittee appointed to redraft this bill. The bill as it now comes on the floor is not the bill the subcommittee wrote. It has been changed by the whole committee. I was not present at that meeting and therefore am not familiar with some of the new provisions of the bill.

I am not enthusiastic about granting national charters. I think it a mistake to incorporate political parties, religious associations, patriotic or social societies. To incorporate is to rob the association of sentiment. The soldiers who are pushing this act are making a mistake. However, I am not authorized to speak for them. They possibly know better than I, but I feel that the legal machinery which is embodied necessarily in an act creating a corporation destroys very largely the sentiment that ought to hold it together. Some men will become officers in it with the right to control. A board of men will be selected who will have the right to fix its policies, and inevitably the business side must supplant entirely the sentimental.

I totally disagree and the subcommittee totally disagreed with some of the conclusions of the whole committee. I do not know what counsels prevailed in the committee which induced it to change the provisions of the draft of the subcommittee and hereby seek to incorporate certain men. As a matter of fact you incorporate activities. This undertakes to say that certain men are a corporation, which they are not. There seems to be a bad precedent established in granting national corporations by saying that "Bill Jones" and "John Smith" and their sons-in-law are hereby declared to be a corporation. This ought to be amended, and I shall suggest it again, because I know it was the idea of the subcommittee when it rewrote the bill that the nonpolitical patriotic society known as the American Legion "is hereby created a body politic and corporate," and that all men who belong to the society shall participate in its organization by the election of officers and the adoption of its constitution and by-laws. There is no sense in saying that these men constitute this corporation. I am not criticizing them. They are very excellent people. I remember among them Mr. Bennett Clark, and we all love him. No one connected with the House organization had more friends or has more friends than he. I do not believe they want to or will abuse their position as corporators, and I am not suggesting that, but I say it is absolutely foolish and silly to say that we incorporate Bennett Clark and Luke Lea and these other people, because it is not the men that we are incorporating, but it is the activities of the society known as the American Legion. The bill ought to be amended to show that. While I know that it is not the intention of it, yet if this charter be granted as it is now written in this bill, we all know that those men who now hold membership in the organization are the only ones who ever can be chosen as members of the corporation unless it be amended. After naming these people it provides that such persons as may be chosen who are members of the American Legion, an unincorporated society of soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Great War of 1917–18, known as the American Legion, and so forth. Unless they are now members of an unincorporated society known as the American Legion they will not be eligible to be chosen as members of this corporation.

As I said, I am going to vote for this measure, but I am going to do so with great reluctance. I do not believe it bespeaks the sentiment of the great majority of soldiers, sailors, and marines who won this war, because I fear a corporation robs the whole organization of the sentiment that makes it sacred to the members of this society.

I want to answer the suggestion of my friend from Missouri [Mr. DYER], who seems to be overafraid that some one is attempting to discriminate against the negro in this country. To say that every man who is an honorably discharged soldier, sailor, or marine of this Great War has by that right alone an absolute right to be a member would be an outrage on the membership of this society. To say that no one except he be an honorably discharged soldier, sailor, or marine is eligible goes as far as we ought to go. It is entirely possible and probable, and will happen, that some honorably discharged soldier, sailor, or marine, even though he is not a negro, that my friend is so much concerned about, but at this time an honest white man, may become an outlaw, a common horse thief, and yet under the terms of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] he would have an absolute legal right to demand membership in this society, and if the local post were to deny him membership he could go into court and force his membership upon honest, decent men.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. You refer to a condition of membership in this organization being based upon having an honorable discharge.

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not read section 5, page 9, in that way. It says:

> That no person shall be a member of this corporation unless he served in the naval or military service of the United States.

That is very broad and sweeping. It does not limit it to men who were discharged honorably from that service.

Mr. CARAWAY. I think the gentleman is entirely right. The bill has been rewritten and that section had not been called to my attention. But the incorporation ought to say that all soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Great War who have been honorably discharged, and none except those, shall be eligible.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If you put in the words "honorably discharged," then you bar those soldiers who would otherwise be eligible to membership in this organization who are at present in the service of the United States Army and may continue there for a lifetime.

Mr. CARAWAY. I understood that was the intention of it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman want to bar out the Regulars?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no. That was the language that the proponents of the measure brought to Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman from Ohio give me five minutes more?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will.

Mr. MORGAN. As I understood the meaning of section 5, it was that we would say that we would limit the membership to officers and the men who served. The constitution itself and the by-laws would prescribe the other membership. For instance, some men who are honorably discharged——

Mr. CARAWAY. I hope the gentleman will not take my time. He has time of his own.

Mr. MORGAN. There are men who are honorably discharged, and yet it was supposed they were conscientious objectors, and we leave that entirely to the constitution and by-laws.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to say this in conclusion, if the gentleman is through, that if a man on this floor has such little confidence in the membership of this society that is to be formed that he is unwilling to trust to the patriotism and the good judgment and the sense of fair dealing of the boys that are to constitute this organization that he wants to write into the organic act itself who shall be its members, he has less confidence in the patriotism and sense of fairness and intelligence of the membership of the organization than I. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is not willing to trust the boys who are to constitute the local posts to say who shall be members of their own local organization, but he wants Congress to say, inasmuch as he is not willing to trust them, that these whom he shall designate shall be eligible members and that the soldiers can not exclude them.

Mr. BEE. Is not that the result of a national incorporation? Do you not, in other words, put the matter in the hands of the National Government where a member is refused admission, and he can go to the courts?

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what the gentleman would do by his amendment. It would make the courts the arbiters as to who should be or should not be members of this society. It would force upon these the association of men who in other walks of life they would refuse to recognize.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is exactly what we are trying to do.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know that. The gentleman has no confidence in the boys who are to compose the organization, and thinks he alone possesses the knowledge and patriotism that would qualify him to say who shall be members of the organization.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The negro soldiers fought alongside of us, did they not?

Mr. CARAWAY. Not alongside the gentleman from New York, if I know anything about his military record.

Mr. BEE. He was in the air, was he not?

Mr. CARAWAY. Who said so?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. As it has not been found necessary by the men who fought the great Civil War on either side to ask for a national incorporation, and the Grand Army of the Republic worked out its organization and the United Confederate Veterans worked out its organization, why could we not permit the veterans of the World War to work out their organization?

Mr. CARAWAY. The gentleman from Louisiana knows that that question answers itself. I am satisfied that the rank and file of this society would like to work out its own destiny. I am satisfied that those who have no voice in this movement would be glad to do it. But I am not, as I said in the beginning, willing to put my judgment against theirs. They come here believing they represent the sentiment of the boys who won the war, and I am going to vote for the bill, but I will do so with a great deal of hesitancy. But I never am going to say to any body of men who are so thoroughly trusted and honored as these, "We are willing to risk our fate and future in your keeping, but are not willing to risk you in saying who shall and who shall not be your comrades and associates in this organization."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARD. How much time remains, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. GARD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arizona is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] stated what seemed to be the prevailing opinion of the House, that the list of names of incorporators of the American Legion as set out in this bill was not representative of the entire country. I am inclined to agree with him, because I find that the States of Arizona, Arkansas, California, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Dakota, South Carolina, South Dakota, Utah, Virginia, Vermont, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming are not represented in the list of incorporators. The persons named in the bill as reported to the House are beyond question 34 most excellent and patriotic gentlemen. I understand they comprise 17 representatives of the American Legion as originally formed in France, and 17 others who served during the war on this side of the water.

It is my purpose, when the proper time comes, to offer an amendment to this bill, striking out the names of the incorporators therein listed and substituting in lieu thereof the name of each one of the chairmen who have been selected in the several States and Territories by the returned soldiers, sailors, and marines, since they were discharged from the service, as heads of the State organizations of the American Legion. The best way to determine who they are is to read the list from the roster of State officers which appears in the last issue of the American Legion Weekly. I read:

Alabama: Bibb Graves, of Montgomery.
Arizona: Andrew P. Martin, of Tucson.
Arkansas: J. J. Harrison, of Little Rock.
California: Henry G. Mathewson, of San Francisco.
Colorado: H. A. Saidy, of Colorado Springs.
Connecticut: Alfred A. Phillips, of Stamford.
Delaware: George N. Davis, of Wilmington.
District of Columbia: E. Lester Jones, of Washington.
Florida: S. L. Lowry, jr., of Tampa.
Georgia: Walter Harris, of Macon.
Hawaii: Lawrence Judd, of Honolulu.
Idaho: E. C. Boom, of Moscow.
Illinois: George G. Seaman, of Taylorville.
Indiana: Raymon S. Springer, of Connersville.
Iowa: Matthew A. Tinley, of Council Bluffs.
Kansas: W. A. Phares, of Wichita.
Kentucky: Attilla Cox, of Louisville.
Louisiana: T. Semmes Walmsley, of New Orleans.
Maine: A. L. Robinson, of Portland.
Maryland: James A. Gary, of Baltimore.
Massachusetts: John F. J. Herbert, of Worcester.
Michigan: George C. Waldo, of Detroit.
Minnesota: Harrison Fuller, of St. Paul.
Mississippi: Alexander Fitzhugh, of Vicksburg.
Missouri: H. C. Clark, of Jefferson City.
Montana: Charles E. Pew, of Helena.
Nebraska: John G. Maher, of Lincoln.
Nevada: E. L. Malsbary, of Reno.
New Hampshire: Frank Knox, of Manchester.
New Jersey: Hobart Brown, of Newark.
New Mexico: Charles M. DeBremon, of Roswell.
New York: Ogden L. Mills, of New York City.
North Carolina: C. K. Burgess, of Raleigh.
North Dakota: Julius Baker, of Fargo.
Ohio: F. C. Galbraith, of Columbus.
Oklahoma: Ross N. Lillard, of Oklahoma City.
Oregon: E. L. Eivers, of Portland
Philippine Islands: Robert R. Landon, of Manila.
Pennsylvania: George F. Tyler, of Philadelphia.
Rhode Island: Alexander H. Johnson, of Providence.
South Carolina: Julius H. Walker, of Columbia.
South Dakota: T. R. Johnson, of Sioux Falls.
Tennessee: Roan Waring, of Memphis.
Texas: Claude B. Birkhead, of San Antonio.
Utah: Wesley E. King, of Salt Lake City.
Virginia: Francis Cocke, of Roanoke.
Vermont: H. Nelson Jackson, of Burlington.
Washington: Harvey J. Moss, of Seattle.
West Virginia: Jackson Arnold, of Charleston.
Wisconsin: E. F. Ackley, of Milwaukee.
Wyoming: A. H. Beach, of Lusk.

All of these State chairmen have been selected by the returned soldiers, sailors, and marines since they were discharged from the service at fair and free elections. They represent the rank and file of the American Legion, and it seems to me, if Congress wants to make this organization nation wide and fully representative of all of those who served in the World War, we should substitute these names.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I notice in this list of incorporators the names of Bennett C. Clark, of Missouri, and Theodore Roosevelt, jr., of New York. Now, these gentlemen are both representative of the soldiery of this country, and both went to France and fought and distinguished themselves there. Why would you cut them out?

Mr. HAYDEN. I am aware that Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Clark had more to do with the organization of the American Legion than any other two men when it was originally formed in France, and if the gentleman from Indiana desires to amend my list by adding their names I shall offer no objection. But aside from their names I believe that we should limit the list of incorporators to the State chairmen selected by the returned soldiers themselves, so that it can never be said that Congress has incorporated a hand-picked organization.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Would not the gentleman think that, for the purpose of avoiding any invidious criticism which might be made of that action, it would be infinitely better to strike out all the names? They are not necessary.

Mr. HAYDEN. There is undoubtedly much force in the gentleman's suggestion; but if names are to be mentioned I insist that we adopt a list that is representative of the entire membership of the American Legion in all parts of the United States. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to use further time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I think there is a great deal of unnecessary talk about the gentlemen who are named as incorporators. It is the common custom when a corporation is created that the persons named shall be the incorporators, not with the idea that they are going to run the machine, but simply that they are a corporation inchoate until meetings for the election of officers, adoption of by-laws, and so forth, can be held to give the corporation full legal existence.

Now, when the time comes I hope to have an opportunity of offering an amendment, and that amendment shall be to strike out, after the names in this first section, line 12, all down to the word "Legion," in the sixteenth line, and then add so that the section would read as follows: "Eric Fisher Wood, of Pennsylvania, George H. Wood, of Ohio, and the others named are hereby created and declared to be a body politic. The name of this corporation shall be the 'American Legion.'" And then insert "And the incorporators above named and such other persons as may be duly accredited as delegates from any local or State organization of the American Legion are hereby authorized to meet and complete the organization of such corporation by the election of officers, the adoption of a constitution, by-laws." and so on. And then the second section I would strike out entirely and insert the following: "All members who are or who may hereafter become members in good standing of the organization known as the 'American Legion,' unincorporated, shall, upon application, become members of the corporation."

It seems to me that that would absolutely obviate all the objections that have been offered here and make a plain, clear statement of the whole situation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I want to devote just a few minutes to a question or two in connection with this proposed charter.

It has been suggested that Congress has no power to make this organization a national incorporation. As this bill was originally drafted it would if passed have created a corporation of the District of Columbia. If there ever was an organization that was national in character, that would help to build up a national spirit, it is this sort of an organization.

It seemed to the committee that it had a right to put this upon an entirely different basis from that of the ordinary incorporations that we have been granting by making this a national and not a District charter. There is, as I take it, power to do what this bill proposes. Many years ago this Government sought to create a park at Gettysburg, where that great battle was fought for the preservation of the Union. The question was raised whether we as a National Government could take that battle field and make it into a park. The question went to the Supreme Court of the United States and was very carefully discussed there, and the Supreme Court unhesitatingly expressed the opinion that as the object was national in its character, designed to preserve the memory of that struggle and encourage and foster devotion to the country and its institutions, we could take that land and make of it a public park. It seems to me that this is on all fours with that doctrine. If Members will take the pains to read that case, I believe they will have no doubt whatever that we have the power to make this a national incorporation. Otherwise it never ought to le incorporated.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman maintain that a decision concerning the right to acquire property throws any light on the question of the propriety of Congress granting this incorporation?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The question in that case was whether the creation of such a park was a public purpose in aid of any power granted to Congress. It was predicated upon the idea that it would help the Government in creating and maintaining a national spirit. It would seem to me that the very same thing may be said in favor of this bill. I am sure this movement is national in spirit, that it will encourage devotion to the flag and help stir a spirit of patriotism.

Another objection has been made that we do not give this incorporation a location, so that a person can know where to sue it. We do not need to do that. This corporation could be sued at any place where an officer of it can be found. We ought not to confine it to the District of Columbia. If you make it a corporation of the District of Columbia it will be subject in all probability to the laws of the District of Columbia, and you will have an unworkable charter, unless you include provisions in the bill under which it can maintain organizations outside of the District. For that reason I should be very much opposed to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question not quite in line with what he is saying?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Section 8 provides that they shall have the exclusive right to the name of the American Legion. Now, suppose any considerable number of the discharged soldiers who fought in this war should organize a separate society of veterans. Is there any reason why we should foreclose their right to use the name American Legion?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think we ought to, if you will pardon me. This organization had its inception in France. Some 1,200 men, selected from the various organizations then in France, met at Paris for the purpose of creating an organization. Later on this organization arranged a meeting at St. Louis. My recollection is that it was stated in the hearings that something like 1,200 men met at St. Louis, representing a very large number of people from various sections, not confined to any particular State or any special locality. Those men selected a committee of 100 and instructed that committee to seek incorporation from the National Government. That committee of 100 selected 17 men as a sort of executive committee to carry on the business during the interval between the meeting at St. Louis and the meeting to be held at Minneapolis, Minn., November 11, on the anniversary of the armistice, for the purpose of more thoroughly organizing the society. The committee of 100 finally selected the men whose names appear in this bill as the ones to make the application for this charter.

It seems to me that the objections that have been raised to the selection of these men as incorporators should disappear when the facts are understood. Here is the situation: When this organization meets at Minneapolis there will in all probability be several thousand men from various sections of the country belonging to it, because the work of organizing these soldiers and sailors has been constantly going on. The men sent as delegates will have the right to participate in framing the constitution and by-laws, electing the officers, and will have a right to act as members of this corporation. So it seems to me that the fear expressed that the few men named as incorporators will monopolize this organization is utterly without any foundation whatever. Just stop and think. What sense would there be, what earthly use would this incorporation be to these few men unless they can get the others with them? The main object of this incorporation is to help them to get every soldier and sailor to join with them so as to make the organization as strong as possible. It would be ridiculous for these men to undertake to exclude anyone who is eligible to become a member.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Right in line with the suggestion that it seems to be necessary to incorporate this society in order to inculcate and encourage a patriotic interest in it, that has not been the experience of all the great societies of a similar kind that have preceded it. On the contrary, if the gentleman will allow me, the very fact that the Grand Army of the Republic, the United Confederate Veterans, and the United Spanish War Veterans were bound together by a comradeship and a fellowship that no law could substitute or supply made their organization far more vital, sentimental, and enduring than anything that could be enacted by statute by a disinterested body like Congress, and it was elastic enough so that it would suit itself to changing conditions.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I grant you that no corporation that we can form will hold these men together. They will fall to pieces if the spirit is not there. There is no doubt about that; but I do believe that this organization will help them stay together, and I am in favor of granting them this charter.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does not the gentleman think that in the exuberance of the freshness of this opportunity some one has advised these young citizens that they would be advantaged by having an incorporation under law, but that they will learn in the course of years, and a very few years at that, that they would have been very much better off without it; that the rigidity of a contract entered into with the United States Government in the form of a charter of incorporation will tend to make their society less elastic and less progressive, because they constantly must be confined so to conform to the hard and fast letter of the statute that they will be like some commercial institution that has to be accountable for sums of money and trust property?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. They will only have to be accountable for common honesty.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Do they need to incorporate for that?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. They do not need it for that. This charter will assist them in keeping up their organization. There is no restriction in it—no limit—and even common honesty is not required of them under the charter. We know they need no such obligation written into it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Precisely, and my object in making these suggestions is not by any means to run counter to a very proper sentiment of these faithful and gallant young men. We all sympathize with them, and we are all interested, and as a matter of sentiment alone we will be glad to do any reasonable thing for them; but does not the gentleman, as a man of experience, who has watched the progress of these other patriotic societies nearly since the inception of the Grand Army of the Republic, which is now half a century, think that their experience is sufficient admonition to these young men that in a very short time to come they will wish they had not incorporated?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think so.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And they will wish they had the elastic, open, flowing fellowship of a free patriotic organization to hold them together.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I did not yield to the gentleman to make a speech, but it seems to me there is nothing in that contention at all. We do not take away from them any rights. We confer certain rights upon them. We do not in this charter specify anything in the way of limitations, but on the contrary practically give them power to do anything they see fit. We furnish them a form of incorporation. The Grand Army sought it, but for some reason or other it was not granted. The Spanish veterans asked for it, but they did not get it, and we have constant appeals of this kind. Organizations of this kind are anxious for charters, and no one doubts their value.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question before he leaves the floor? Will the gentleman say that a body of men, who are honest, who are faithful unto death, who have served together on the battle fields of France or in the camps or anywhere else where their duty called them without a charter of incorporation to make them mutually accountable when it was a matter of life and death, now need a charter from the United States of America in order that they may account for their petty one-cent money affairs for the purpose of preserving their fellowship?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. They ask it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How many of them ask it? That is the point. Has there been anything like a canvass of these 4,000,000 men?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. We have organizations in every State of the Union, and there is no question but that to-day a very large proportion of these men are inside of these organizations. We have not heard a single protest. The only protest comes from this floor. Everyone so far as I know has asked for it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman is trying to prove a negative.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The gentleman is asking me to prove a negative.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, no; I have more respect for the gentleman's intelligence than that. The point is simply that because there has been no protest coming up from States where they were not all warned perhaps that a certain thing is to be done is no evidence that they approve that the thing shall be done. As a matter of fact, if I may be permitted in this way to make an inquiry, for I have not had any opportunity of getting time, instead of their being a living organization which is recognized throughout these various States, a personal canvass among these soldiers, I undertake to say, will indicate that they have not yet made up their minds whether they want to join anything or not.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. We have had considerable experience in regard to granting articles of incorporation. Many bills have been introduced for charters, and almost every time when a bill of that kind comes in some one protests because the granting of a charter will conflict with the interests of certain other organizations.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not distrust these men and I do not want to be misunderstood.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Just a minute. Here is the situation. If these soldiers did not want this incorporation, if there were any independent organizations opposed to this bill we would have heard from them long ago, we would have had any number of letters protesting, but not a single letter has come to me of that kind. Everything that has come to the committee, everything that has come to me as a Member has been in favor of the bill, and if the gentleman has a single one in protest I would like to have him produce it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am not trying to prove any negative. My suggestion is that what you can fairly construe to be perhaps relative indifference on the part of the men who neither protest or affirm——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Oh, the gentleman simply assumes that somebody is opposed to it without any proof.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am not opposed to anything I think is reasonable, and I am not seeking to cast any reflection on the men who seek this charter. I have no idea but that their purpose is altogether disinterested and loyal and to be approved. I am speaking about the proposition whether when this body does finally get on its feet, when the 4,000,000 men are actually represented in some living organization, not a preliminary attempt at one, they will themselves believe that it was a wise thing to crystallize themselves into a hard and fast contract with the Government of the United States for the preservation of their fellowship.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. They do not crystallize themselves or make any such contracts.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The original draft seems to be the one the soldiers want. Section 4, page 4, defines eligibility. Why did the committee weaken that clause by changing it?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The original bill was not presented as the result of any careful study on the part of the members of the organization. When it was presented it was freely admitted that it needed amendment, and the reason why we made the change was that we did not want to determine who should be members. We proposed to leave that to the members themselves. We did not want to do as the gentleman has just suggested, tie them up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARD. I desire to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. Is it the purpose of the chairman of the committee to shut off the consideration of amendments?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I just wanted to move the previous question on the bill. I would like, since this is considered in the House, very much to arrive at some arrangement in reference to amendments.

Mr. GARD. I am willing to accede to any arrangement, but surely Members should have the right to present amendments.

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman moves the previous question, it will cut off all amendments.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I understand that amendments have not been offered. I withdraw the motion for the time being with the understanding that amendments be offered and then the previous question may be ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendments.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman withdraw his motion for the previous question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He did.

Mr. DYER. Should not the bill be read by sections for amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. We are not in the committee; we are in the House. The bill has been read the second time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be read as under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is all right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the bill be read as under the five-minute rule. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Under this arrangement is the bill now being read by sections for amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request was that it be considered as under the five-minute rule. The Chair assumed that that would be to read it by sections.

Mr. DYER. The Clerk should proceed to read the bill now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. GARD. I ask unanimous consent that the reading begin on page 6, line 17, with the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the reading begin on page 6 with the committee amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, in order to read this bill under the five-minute rule we have to read it all. Of course, the stump speech in the form of whereases is no part of the bill and that might be stricken out.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman does not want to strike out that.

Mr. MADDEN. It ought to be stricken out.

Mr. DYER. I ask for the regular order, which is the reading of the bill. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. The bill has been amended by striking out all of the original bill and the rewriting of the bill complete. It occurs to me that the proper thing to do is to adopt the committee amendment and then proceed to amend the committee bill. That would clarify the parliamentary situation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the proper thing to do, it seems to me, is to consider the committee amendment as the bill itself and read it, and then proceed to add amendments or not, as you choose, and when you get through and this House committee amendment has been amended, then vote on that as amended and then vote on the original bill, with this as a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It perfects the text of the committee amendment first.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then consider the question of whether this is to be substituted for the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If we proceed, then, to perfect the text of the committee amendment, that will mean that a proposed amendment is in the nature of an amendment to the amendment, and the only second degree is a substitute, and there can not be the other elasticity of an amendment, and then another amendment to the amendment and a substitute; it would cut off one.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee amendment and an amendment to that would be, of course, an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. So the other one will have to be a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will be in the third degree.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill, except in the manner provided by the rules of the House. That means you have to read the bill—that part of it stricken out as well as the part which is attempted to be substituted for that which is stricken out. The whole of it has to be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the bill be read as under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MADDEN. That includes the reading of the bill from the beginning.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, there is not a particle of sense in reading that original matter in there, because the committee amendment is substituted for it.

Mr. MADDEN. There may not be any sense in it, but that is in accordance with the rules of the House. I do not know whether the rules of the House have any sense or not, but that is the provision.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Sometimes they have not.

Mr. MADDEN. The request of the gentleman from Minnesota was to read the bill under the rules.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that this House amendment as reported in here and printed in the bill be considered as the bill itself, that the committee amendment be considered as the bill, and that will open up the privileges of amendment by two amendments and a substitute and an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. MADDEN. I would not object to that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask that that be done, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the committee amendment be considered as the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, the proper parliamentary procedure would be to adopt this amendment first.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, no. That would carry with it all these amendments to be added to it.

Mr. DOWELL. It does not. It merely substitutes the committee amendment for the original, and then it is before the House for consideration.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you adopted the committee amendment as the whole thing, you could not amend.

Mr. DOWELL. By unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You could not do it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the committee amendment be considered as the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following persons, to wit: William S. Beam, of North Carolina; Charles H. Brent, of New York; William H. Brown, of Connecticut; G. Edward Buxton, jr., of Rhode Island; Bennett C. Clark, of Missouri; Richard Derby, of New York; L. H. Evridge, of Texas; Milton Foreman, of Illinois; Ruby D. Garrett, of Missouri; Fred J. Griffith, of Oklahoma; Roy C. Haines, of Maine; J. F. J. Herbert, of Massachusetts; Roy Hoffman, of Oklahoma; Fred B. Humphreys, of New Mexico; John W. Inzer, of Alabama; Stuart S. Janney, of Maryland; Luke Lea, of Tennessee; Henry Leonard, of Colorado; Henry D. Lindsley, of Texas; Ogden L. Mills, of New York; Thomas W. Miller, of Delaware; Edward Myers, of Pennsylvania; Franklin D'Olier, of Pennsylvania; W. G. Price, jr., of Pennsylvania; S. A. Ritchie, of New York; Theodore Roosevelt, jr., of New York; Albert A. Sprague, of Illinois; John J. Sullivan, of Washington; Dale Shaw, of Iowa; Daniel G. Strivers, of Montana; H. J. Turney, of Ohio; George A. White, of Oregon; Eric Fisher Wood, of Pennsylvania; George H. Wood, of Ohio; and such persons as may be chosen who are members of the "American Legion," an unincorporated patriotic society of the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Great War, 1917–18, known as the "American Legion," are hereby created and declared to be a body corporate. The name of this corporation shall be the "American Legion."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer an amendment to correct a name.

Mr. HAYDEN. My amendment is to strike out all the names.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], a member of the committee, is entitled to prior recognition.

Mr. GARD. I desire to submit an amendment, and I also ask unanimous consent that the Clerk report therewith an amendment I propose to offer as a new section.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer an amendment to correct a name of one of the incorporators. It reads "Milton Foreman." It should be "Milton J. Foreman." I want to put the letter "J." in there.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 17, after the word "corporate," strike out the period and insert "of the District of Columbia."

On page 10, line 6, insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. 9½. The principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, and offices may be maintained and meetings of the corporation or of the trustees and committees may be held in other places such as the by-laws may from time to time fix."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to make any further argument upon the question of limitation of power. I think that I explained that as fully as I could in my previous statement of this matter, and I have asked that section 9½ be read as explanatory of my idea in giving this American Legion the power to have its main office in the District of Columbia, and to have its places of meeting, either as an incorporate body or through its officers or trustees, at any place in the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to oppose this amendment. I do not see any good reason why we should make this an incorporation of the District of Columbia, or why we should provide for its having its main office in the city of Washington. There is no question, it seems to me, in view of the decisions I have called attention to, of our power to give these people an incorporation that is national, and if we propose to give them anything, let us give them an act that shows that we recognize their object as patriotic and an aid to the national spirit that it will foster. It seems to me we ought to be willing to give them a national incorporation instead of granting them a measly District of Columbia charter.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the amendment pending—the amendment that has just been read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two amendments have been offered.

Mr. GARD. The amendment that was read was the first amendment that I offered, and I asked unanimous consent that the other be read as explanatory.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. I offered an amendment, but withheld it on account of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to perfect the text.

Mr. HAYDEN. I will yield to the gentleman, who is a member of the committee.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman has a substitute for the whole section?

Mr. HAYDEN. I have a substitute for the list of names. There is more to the section than that.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman has no objection to my offering an amendment to perfect the bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. I have no objection, inasmuch as the gentleman is a member of the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. DYER: Page 7, lines 12 and 13, after the word "Ohio," strike out "and such persons as may be chosen who are" and insert "such other persons as are or may become," so that it will read: "and such other persons as are or may become members of the American Legion," etc.

Mr. DYER. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is only to correct the text, and I believe that is what is desired by the House, because these gentlemen whose names are mentioned and all other members of the American Legion who are not now members, but who may become members under the by-laws, will have a right to be members of this corporation.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield? The purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to make every man in the American Legion an incorporator?

Mr. DYER. Every one who is a member of it.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman does not desire that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri will not prevail. The language in the bill as reported is perfectly clear and needs no amendment to better it. The language which is offered as a substitute is calculated to create confusion. Read again these words—and such persons who may be chosen who are members of the American Legion.

This language——

Mr. DYER. I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Pardon me for a second. This language was carefully considered when the committee of the American Legion was before the Committee on the Judiciary, and it was considered then that it clearly defined what was intended to be granted by the provisions of this bill. It means any persons who may be chosen who are at the time the choice is made members of the American Legion. Nothing could be clearer.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. While the language that is offered as a substitute might be construed to mean any person who is a member of the American Legion, or who may at some future time become a member of the American Legion, that is not what is intended by the section.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Surely.

Mr. DYER. I wanted to ask the gentleman how he understands the others are to be chosen. Who is to choose them?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The American Legion. Section 2 provides for that.

Mr. DYER. How does that provide?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. If you will read it you will see. I do not want to read it in answer to a question.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman gives his opinion. I will read it to him. He has just arrived on the scene. Section 2 provides:

That said persons named in section 1 and such other persons as may be selected.

Now, the gentleman refuses to answer a question when I ask him, although he refers to a hearing and says it was freely discussed by the committee, when the hearing consisted of but one gentleman who testified before the committee.

But the point I am trying to make, Mr. Speaker, is that there is no provision in these two sections that authorizes the members of the American Legion to select these men, but that they will be selected by those whose names are printed in the bill. That is not what we want to do if we intend to make this organization open to all those who are eligible to membership.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to antagonize this amendment. The trouble about this amendment is that if it is adopted it will work absolute confusion.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. If it is adopted, of course it will prevent anybody from joining the American Legion who is not now a member of the unincorporated legion?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; certainly. It would make every member of the legion an incorporator, and it would be impossible to get them together to transact business. You could not tell what a quorum was.

But I do not want to talk about the amendment very much. I wanted to say a word or two to straighten out three or four matters of confusion that are in the minds of the Members. The genesis of this legion is this: Gen. Pershing asked the various commands in France to send delegates and representatives to a meeting of the soldiers in Paris at a certain date. Of course, they had all been talking in camp there after the armistice about organizing something of this sort. I think there were 3,000 at that meeting in Paris. Anyhow, my son, Col. Bennett C. Clark, was president or chairman of the meeting. Then he and Col. Roosevelt were appointed by this meeting in Paris to call a meeting in the United States as a preliminary meeting for organization, and Col. Roosevelt came back to this country before my son did. Col. Roosevelt issued the call and signed both the names to it, and invited all the soldiers, both privates and officers, that were in this army during the World War to send representatives to this meeting in St. Louis, and there was a very large attendance there. They elected my son temporary chairman. They elected Col. Lindsley, of Texas, as chairman or president of this preliminary committee that they appointed, and Col. Lindsley is the president of it yet.

Mr. MADDEN. Ad interim president?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; ad interim president. All these steps have been taken simply as preliminaries. They are not trying to gobble up the whole thing. You must presume on men's common sense.

Now, if this charter is amended what is going to happen is this: They have already called a meeting at Minneapolis for November 11, and these incorporators undoubtedly will prepare some kind of a scheme to have a representative body there, and our part of it ceases, and they will adopt a constitution and by-laws and proceed like any other set of good citizens in the United States. That is all there is to it. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman inform us whether Gen. Pershing called this conference in Paris by direction of the War Department or merely on his own initiative?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not know that happened. I am not certain that Gen. Pershing actually called it. But evidently after the armistice it was perfectly natural. They did not have anything to do, and in their camps they talked this thing over, and agreed that it would be a good thing to form a social organization, and patriotic, for the soldiers, sailors, and marines and all the rest who were in this great war. There was no official business about it, and there will not be.

It is absolute nonsense to talk about these incorporators who happen to be named here—I do not care a straw who is named—holding onto the organization. They could not do it to save their lives. The other fellows would take it away from them the very first minute they undertook to do it, and if you pass this bill I am not certain that it will be a great blessing, whichever way you fix it. Ordinarily I am not much in favor of incorporating organizations by Congress. But I do not see how this will do anybody any harm. They declare in this charter that it is a nonpolitical organization, and of course it is nonreligious. That is absolutely unnecessary anyway. There is no use in paying attention to that. I do not see any harm it will do and it may do much good.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman finished?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment that I offered.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULINGS: Page 7, line 12, after the word "Ohio," strike out all down to the word "Legion," in line 16, and after the word "Legion," in line 18, insert "and the incorporators above named and such other persons as may be duly accredited as delegates from any State or local organization of the existing unincorporated organization known as the 'American Legion' are hereby authorized to meet and complete the organization of said corporation by the election of officers, the adoption of a constitution and by-laws, and the doing of all other things necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act."

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I think this amendment obviates all the objections that have been made. It simply makes these men who are named here the incorporators of a body corporate, and then it goes on to provide that they, together with such delegates as may be sent from the local organizations, shall be authorized to make by-laws and complete the organization.

Mr. TOWNER. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if his object would not be better accomplished by striking out the language after the word "Ohio"?—

And such persons as may be chosen who are members of the "American Legion," an unincorporated patriotic society of the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Great War, 1917–18, known as the American Legion.

With that language stricken out it will accomplish everything that the gentleman has in mind, because section 2 provides for the organization of the corporation, for the framing of the constitution, and the making of by-laws.

Mr. HULINGS. No; I do not understand that it does any such thing. Section 2 provides that the persons named in section 1, and such other persons as may be selected, presumably by them, shall hold this meeting to make the by-laws and effect an organization, and persons who are duly accredited delegates shall be permitted to participate. It does not make them members of the corporation at all.

Mr. TOWNER. The words—

And such other persons as may be selected—do not refer to the corporate organization at all.

Mr. HULINGS. Who is going to select them?

Mr. TOWNER. This is merely for the purpose of arranging the meeting. This section 2 is merely for the purpose of effecting an organization. The first section is entirely a section for the purpose of forming the corporation. It names the persons who are to form the corporation. Then it provides properly, in section 2, that the organization under this charter shall be made at a certain meeting, and provides the method by which the delegates to this meeting shall be duly accredited, saying that they must be members of this existing organization.

Mr. HULINGS. Yes; but it does not say that they shall become members of the corporation.

Mr. TOWNER. Why, certainly not; and they ought not to be members of the corporation.

Mr. HULINGS. That is just precisely what I want to have my amendment provide, so that every man who has been in the service, who chooses to do so, may become a member of this corporation.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, the fact is that the organization of a corporation is entirely separate and distinct from the formation of the corporation. The organization is perfected when they meet under the powers that are stated in the corporate act. That ought to be clear, at least to every lawyer. The corporate act is what we are now adopting. The organization of the corporation will come when the persons meet who are authorized to meet and form their constitution and adopt their by-laws. They then, of course, become members of the corporation; but the act itself merely incorporates them by making these gentlemen the incorporators; that is all. The persons who are selected by this meeting as the officers will presumably hold their offices for only a certain specified time, during which time they will be members of the corporation, and then their successors will be members of the corporation. So that all that is necessary is to perfect the machinery for the addition of names to those persons who are named in the act of incorporation, and that ought to be done.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULINGS. Was that the gentleman's time or mine?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HULINGS. I ask that the gentleman have two minutes, so that I can ask him a question.

Mr. TOWNER. I ask for an extension of my time, and will then yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULINGS. I do not know whether the gentleman was in the Hall or not, but the strongest objection to the bill as presented here was to the words—and such persons as may be chosen.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. I think I understand the process of the incorporation of a corporation; but in order to obviate the objection that the incorporators might hand-pick the delegates, I have suggested in my amendment, besides the striking out of the words that you recommend, that the incorporators "and such delegates as may be selected by the local camps shall be authorized to hold the meeting," and so forth, and perfect the organization. Now, it may be that the same thing could be accomplished by calling that section 2, but I have another amendment for section 2, striking out all of the section and inserting in lieu thereof the words—

All persons who are or who may hereafter become members in good standing of any State or local organization of the unincorporated American Legion shall upon application become members of the corporation.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I have improved this parliamentary subterfuge to give me an opportunity to say something as to the general merits of the proposition before us.

I think the very example we have just witnessed of men expert in the law undertaking to satisfy themselves and this House how the machinery which they propose to set up to operate this American Legion will work is a very good evidence of the undesirability of passing any such law at all. If we were engaged in the serious business of making a charter for the establishment and maintenance of a business proposition, a commercial, industrial, or financial corporation, then, of course, all these refinements of the law, all this safeguarding and the precise texts of statutes, what they mean and how they shall be construed, would be serious matters to be deliberated upon here, and solemn matters to be carried into effect by those to whom the corporation is intrusted. But that supposes that the incorporation is to apply to a business undertaking, with some financial or economic responsibility, to which other people might perhaps intrust their funds or their own obligations and contracts.

The very purpose, however, of this organization which seeks incorporation is nothing of that kind whatever. It is simply a glorious, a noble, sentimental organization. It does not propose to do business. It expressly stipulates that it shall not be organized for any political or material purpose whatsoever. It is an organization to afford a vehicle for the perpetuation and enjoyment of that beautiful sentiment of comradeship and fellowship that has come up among the men who dared and braved death together through this horrible war that this Nation might endure. [Applause.] This sentimental association is an association of fellowship for the perpetuation of the national ideals that these men hope to inspire by their good citizenship. It is in the very nature of its existence an intangible expression of such a lofty sentiment of citizenship and has no need of incorporation, has no need of all these refinements and subtleties of law about which we even now, when we seek to give it expression, do not agree among ourselves.

If there be anything in the world less calculated to stimulate the noble object of these splendid citizens of ours, it is the very idea of tying their idealistic undertaking to the hard and fast terms of a statute law. The very purpose of its existence is fellowship and sentiment; not to do business, not to be held to strict account by ledger books and auditors, nothing that they are going to be responsible for to the citizens of the United States under the stipulations of a charter party; and if we do not now find ourselves able to agree on terms by which they shall organize in the letter of the law, how are they going to live up to it afterwards with any opportunity to enjoy the advantage of that freedom which fellowship only needs in order to perpetuate itself?

I speak this with all deference. While I would not presume to elect myself the spokesman of you gentlemen, yet I have enjoyed your society long enough here to know that I reflect at least a part of your minds in this, that not one of us here wants to put himself on record, much less to wish in his own mind, to do anything to the disadvantage of these brave young men who have come here for this purpose, and not one of us wants to put himself in the attitude of being anything but grateful, helpful, and encouraging. There is no question about that. But I think we ought not to allow ourselves to be betrayed into the thought that possibly if we scrutinize and criticize this undertaking as it has expressed itself here to us we may be suspected of being hostile to the soldier and his sentiment. No one here is hostile to the soldier or to his sentiment. Every one of us is proud of it. But the question is whether we are consulting in the end not merely the inclination of the soldier himself, as he has hastily presented it here to us, but whether we are consulting his own best interests in the days to come when these young soldiers will be older——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. When these brave young men will be older, when the great majority of them not now seniors will be more mature and experienced in the ways of the world, and perhaps will then have turned to contemplate what you and I in our advantage or disadvantage of age more clearly see—that institutions of that kind which are to perpetuate fellowship, a fellowship that was born on the battle fields where men trusted each other even unto death, do not afterwards need a charter or a contract under seal in order to be perpetuated to the grave. [Applause.]

When they come to understand that they are asking us to set aside an ancient tradition and a splendid rock-bottomed policy of this Government not to lend its charter and seal to undertakings of this character generally, when they come to realize that it puts them in an attitude entirely distinct and more or less opposite in form of operation to the Grand Army of the Republic, to the United Confederate Veterans, to the United Spanish War Veterans, and to other similar institutions that for half a century, and part of them for a quarter of a century nearly, have perpetuated themselves nobly and with most honorable usefulness among their fellow citizens without any of this gear and machinery, I doubt if they will thank us for what some gentlemen seek here to do for them to-day.

When these young men come to realize that they can do all they want to do without this help, and that by and by, perhaps, there will be more things they would like to do but can not do because this help has turned into a limitation, then they will wish they had not been chartered.

The only personally disturbing thought that you and I have of this thing may be, perhaps, based upon envy, a wholesome, healthy, admiring envy that we ourselves are not young and have not their soldier record and are not able to join their institution. But not one of us is hostile to the beautiful sentiment behind it, and it seems to me, as the Nation's lawmakers, that we ought wisely, prudently, and deliberately to consider whether it is, first, consistent with our own theory of lawmaking and national policy; and, second, whether in the long run it is in the interest of these young men themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] are certainly such as we can all agree with. I am sure I, for one, join in what he said in reference to having a feeling perhaps of envy, regret, that we were not able, that I was not able, to participate with these men in the splendid work which they accomplished. We give them all the meed of praise which they justly deserve. We smother our regrets and give them our applause as they come marching back to mingle again with the citizenship of their own country. They have formed an organization for the purpose of good fellowship and promoting patriotism. They are cemented together by what they have passed through, and the granting of a charter can not diminish this feeling or abate their ardor or fervor. These men are now asking us to give them a corporate existence; it is their request, and it is presented by them to the Halls of Congress; and we are to respond to that request. Shall we say to these men we know better than you do what you want; we will deny you incorporation, because we think you can get together and accomplish this just as well without it? I say that if they ask for it, it is a mark of honor and respect for this Congress to grant to them not grudgingly but whole-heartedly the whole measure of their request.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. BAER. Why not give it to them the way they wanted it in the first bill they presented?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's facetious inquiry brings with it a very just answer. This bill puts before the House what after conference and discussion of all the measures they themselves agreed to and now ask for.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. One of the things these young men fought for was that the Congress, which finally passes upon the advisability of all laws and of all charters, should be preserved; not preserved simply to adopt all propositions submitted to it, but that they should be the final judges. Now, does it follow by the gentleman's logic that men who fought to maintain the Congress shall afterwards have every law passed for which they ask?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The gentleman professes to ask me a question and instead has made a reply to part of what I have said. No, we are not to grant every law that these men may ask for, but the fact that they may ask for the passage of any law would be a potential factor with me in considering that law and trying to grant it if they wanted it. But when they have asked for something that is not general legislation, but something connected solely with the question of their society organization, I say in heaven's name let us give it to them as they ask for it. Let me now say a word in reference to the amendment. The language which is used here covers the question of the organization, at least in the thought of the committee, fully and perfectly and, as the representative of the American Legion thought, sufficiently. It is as follows——

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. In just a moment.

"And such persons as may be chosen who are members of the American Legion," and so forth, shall in cooperation with the names of those who are mentioned as incorporators as directed in section 2, where they are named as being duly accredited delegates from any local or State organization, shall perfect the society and set it forth upon its course of usefulness and patriotism.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that all debate upon this amendment may now close.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment pending.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAYDEN: Page 6, line 17, after the words "to wit," strike out all of the remainder of page 6 down to and including the word "Ohio" in line 12 on page 7, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Alabama: Bibb Graves.
Arizona: Andrew P. Martin.
Arkansas: J. J. Harrison.
California: Henry G. Mathewson.
Colorado: H. A. Saidy.
Connecticut: Alfred A. Phillips.
District of Columbia: E. Lester Jones.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, as I explained when discussing this amendment under general debate, I have offered as a substitute for the names listed in the bill those persons who have been selected as chairmen of the American Legion in the different States of the Union, in the Hawaiian Islands, the Philippines, and the District of Columbia—51 in all. We will have a much more representative list of incorporators if we select as the incorporators of this organization men who have been chosen by the returned soldiers without guidance or restraint. By accepting my amendment every State in the Union will be represented, which is not now the case.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield for a question, for information?

Mr. HAYDEN. I will yield to my good friend from New York.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to ask the gentleman, for information, if each of the names he has presented has been a duly elected representative of the American Legion of that State?

Mr. HAYDEN. I obtained the list from the last issue of the American Legion Weekly, published by that organization. It is headed "State officers," and contains a roster of the chairmen who have been elected in the several States.

Mr. SNYDER. Can the gentleman tell me whether the New York State chairman is in that list?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes, sir; Ogden L. Mills.

Mr. SNYDER. I was unable to hear it when the names were read. The reason I ask that question is that I know in my own State that many councils have not been formed as yet, and I did not understand that they were in all of the States. I wondered how it was possible that a list of representatives from each State, regularly elected, could be printed.

Mr. HAYDEN. What the gentleman from New York says is true as to local organizations in the States. I know that is true in my own State, where posts have not yet been established in all of the towns, but a State organization has been perfected in every State in the Union, as is shown by this published list.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman call the names of those States not represented in the bill as incorporators? Will he give that?

Mr. HAYDEN. I have but five minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman will permit, I can answer the other question of the gentleman from New York, that the men now mentioned and named in the amendment were actually elected by as many of the men who are qualified to join the American Legion as they were able to get out at the time the election was held.

Mr. HAYDEN. There is no question about that.

Mr. CALDWELL. There was a general public open request for every man who was eligible; that is, who had been a member of the armed forces of the United States and desired to belong, if they were qualified as having been a member of the armed forces of the United States during the war they were accepted in membership.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to say that I have not been in this debate at all, but I believe that your scheme is the right one just the same and ought to be adopted.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for recognition.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I want to be recognized to offer an amendment to this amendment, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] first.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely trust the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], or some similar amendment, will be adopted. I would not reflect on the great State of Pennsylvania. Her soldiers fought well, and I doubt if the soldiers of any State suffered more severely than did her brave boys. But in after years, Mr. Speaker, 50 years from now, when people read of the action of Congress to-day, should this bill pass, they will find that Pennsylvania has four representatives among the original charter members of the American Legion, while many States have none.

The State that I have the honor to represent has not a single member, and yet beneath the sod of far-away France lie the bodies of many boys from the "land of flowers" and whose families now reside in Florida, and yet we have no representative in this list. The gentleman from Arizona has called attention to the fact that the boys there have named as their representative Mr. Lowry. This gentleman does not reside in my district, but I know him, and he is a clean, fearless, honest young man, and he resides at Tampa, in the first congressional district. I sincerely trust that this House, in fairness and in justice, will not leave Florida and the other States without representation, should the bill finally be enacted into law.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] by adding to the list the names of Bennett C. Clark, of Missouri, and Theodore Roosevelt, jr., of New York. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, I do that for this reason——

Mr. REED of West Virginia. At large?

Mr. ELLIOTT. There are no members at large; but I offer their names as members of this corporation. I do that for this reason: Both of these young men served with distinction and honor in France. After they served their country they came back and were the originators of this movement to incorporate this great organization. I believe their names should be included in the corporation for that reason, if for no other. With that addition to the amendment of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], I think the amendment is all right.

The representative in my State is Raymond S. Springer, who is a young man 35 years old, judge of the circuit court. He went into a training camp and came out at the head of a class of 300 with the rank of captain. He had the highest rank of any man of that class. I presume if you will look through this list of men who have been selected as incorporators from the various States, you will find that every one of them is a representative citizen and soldier of the State which he represents. If you adopt this amendment in the form I have suggested, you will get a representative class incorporating this great movement and it will add a great impetus to the progress of the institution.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the gentleman will yield to me, I will state that I will be glad to accept his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ELLIOTT to the amendment of Mr. HAYDEN: Add the names of Bennett C. Clark, of Missouri, and Theodore Roosevelt, jr., of New York.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], it proposes to strike out all the names mentioned in the bill as incorporators and insert a new list, composed of the chairmen of the State organizations of the American Legion. Now, it seems to me that would be very unwise. I would have no objection personally to adding to these names a list of the State chairmen; but for us to strike out these names that come to us indorsed by this organization would be, in my opinion, a reflection upon the organization that has recommended these men and authorized them to incorporate the society.

The organization began in France. It held a national meeting afterwards at St. Louis. Those meetings were representative in character. They were largely attended. A temporary organization was perfected. A resolution was passed asking for a national charter from Congress. Certain men were instructed to secure this incorporation. It follows that when we strike out the names of these men we reflect upon the entire organization and everything that has been done. Furthermore, we indicate a lack of confidence in these men. Such actions would be not only a reflection upon the organization but a reflection upon the name of every man we strike from this list; and I hope that the Members of this House will not take action here that will be a reflection both upon the men and upon the organization. Every one of them has served his country with great distinction and honor, and I protest against this proposed reflection upon them. I do not believe this House will do that kind of a thing. If you do anything, add the other names to this list.

Mr. LITTLE. Is that the gentleman's motion?

Mr. MORGAN. I have not made any motion.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that in the list of incorporators named in the bill as reported by the committee are about 34 persons from about 17 States, some of the States having as many as 3. And I want to further call the attention of the House to the names of the States which have no representation in the bill. They are Arizona, Arkansas, California, the District of Columbia, Florida, Georgia, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Dakota, South Carolina, South Dakota, Utah, Virginia, Vermont, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

Now, in answer to the argument made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN], that it would be a distinct reflection on the gentlemen whose names are enumerated here to have them stricken out, I do not agree with him. Those gentlemen, I take it for granted, are patriotic, brave soldiers of the World War, and they will fully appreciate and recognize the motives that prompted Congress to adopt this amendment, if it shall be adopted. I believe it will be in the interest of this organization, I believe it will tend to strengthen the usefulness and purposes of this organization, if we are going to have incorporators, to put in one from each of the States, those who have been selected by the soldiers of the respective States. If Congress is going to grant a charter, I think the amendment should be adopted which was offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT], adding the names of the two gallant young Americans who not only served so bravely during the war but who have taken so much interest in the organization of American Legion, namely, Col. Theodore Roosevelt, jr., and Col. Bennett C. Clark. [Applause.]

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALMON. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Does not the gentleman think it would be fair to add all those names that are suggested by the organization?

Mr. ALMON. I believe it would be best to give all the States representation, so that no one will have any cause to criticize Congress, so that there will be no partiality shown to any section of the country or any of the States. I believe that each of the States should be represented on the board of incorporators, if any incorporators are to be named. I believe it will give more general satisfaction.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think it would be entirely proper to have the same representation from a State furnishing 2,000 men as from a State that furnished 600,000 men?

Mr. ALMON. Well, Delaware, Arizona, New Mexico, and some other States each have one Congressman and two Senators, and we can not regulate that. I do not think it is proper for some States to have 3 and about 25 States have no representative.

Mr. MADDEN. You can regulate it in the Army.

Mr. ALMON. I have no objection to allowing the names in the bill to remain and adding the State chairmen, as provided in the amendment of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], but it seems to me that if you are going to incorporate, this is the best solution, so far as the personnel of the incorporators is concerned.

Mr. MADDEN. If it had not been for the big States we would not have won the war.

Mr. ALMON. And it is equally true if it had not been for the little States we would not have won the war.

Mr. KNUTSON. It took the little ones to encourage the big ones. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALMON. The soldiers from the little States were just as brave and rendered just as effective service as those from the big States, and are entitled to as much honor and credit, and no more.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, it has been urged against this section that all of the States are not represented in this list of incorporators. Nearly all the States were represented at the meeting held at St. Louis. That meeting selected 100 men to represent them. They selected the incorporators. It seems to me we ought not to disregard their selection.

I can readily imagine that in case you selected all the people now suggested many of them may not have the leisure to give to this subject, and they might not be able to meet at Minneapolis when it comes time for perfecting this organization. It seems to me it would be better to carry out the wishes of this organization of 100. In reporting this bill we have acted at their suggestion, at their request. Certainly if there is to be a change in this list of names, it ought not to be by striking out the ones that have been selected. If there is to be a change, it ought to be by adding the new names and not by striking out the names of the men the organization wants.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Is it the gentleman's suggestion that instead of striking out the names in the bill and moving to substitute others instead of them, that we should add to the names now in the bill the names of the State chairmen?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not believe we should do either. I believe we ought to leave it to these men to organize their own association.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The smallest State in the Union, Delaware, has one delegate. Several of the largest States have more than one. Why should we not all have representatives?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is no reason why a State should necessarily have any representation among the incorporators. This is not the permanent organization, but only the agency by which the men seek to perfect an organization.

Mr. LEHLBACH rose.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Does my colleague recognize the fact that this is a national organization, national in its scope?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Then let it name every unit in it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. You can not have a president or a secretary from every State. You can not have officers from every State. The organization had to select some one or a few to represent them. They have selected these men, and it seems to me as no one is complaining because he is not represented we might as well comply with their wishes in this matter.

Mr. Speaker, I move that the debate on this amendment be now closed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the debate on this amendment be now closed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to propound a parliamentary inquiry to the Speaker. Is this amendment now pending a substitute for the section?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood it was a substitute for the names.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then it is merely an amendment to the section?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Very well.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment to this effect, that instead of striking out the names that now appear in the bill the names I have submitted in this list of State chairmen be added to the list in the bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the request. The gentleman from Arizona asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment so that instead of striking out the names now in the bill they be left there and his list be added thereto. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I want to make the suggestion to the gentleman that that would put in the names of some of them twice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman accept an amendment that those States that are not represented now be represented by names supplied from his list?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have offered an amendment that I suppose will have to be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it will still be pending.

Mr. ELLIOTT. There is nothing for it to be appended to, and I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I desire to withdraw my amendment, so that the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] can offer his substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAYDEN. I should like to perfect my amendment further in this, that the name of Ogden Mills, of New York, appears in the bill and also appears in my list as the New York chairman. I should like to have the name of Ogden Mills stricken from my list.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Or wherever there is a duplicate name.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Or wherever there is a duplicate name.

The SPEAKER. The request is that wherever there is a duplicate name it be stricken out. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, there is pending an amendment to section 1, which I think should be adopted for the purpose of perfecting the text. I will ask the Clerk to read it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 7, line 16, after the word "Legion," strike out the comma and insert the words "and their successors."

Mr. GARD. I ask that that be inserted, because it seems to me that in the framing of legislation authorizing a corporation these words ought to be used.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That said persons named in section 1 and such other persons as may be selected are hereby authorized to meet to complete the organization of said corporation by the selection of officers, the adoption of a constitution and by-laws, and by the doing of all other things necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act, at which meeting any person duly accredited as a delegate from any local or State organization of the existing unincorporated organization known as the "American Legion" shall be permitted to participate in the proceedings thereof.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk now report the amendment I have offered to page 7, line 20.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 7, line 20, after the word "selected," insert the words "from among the membership of the American Legion, an unincorporated society of the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Great War, 1917–18.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DRANE. Mr. Speaker, in the Great World War, to which every State sent her gallant sons, there was no State which sent a more valiant band than the southernmost of the sisterhood—Florida.

No body of men ever responded more cheerfully and none conducted themselves more gallantly.

Many of these men now sleep in the soil of France, of Belgium, of Italy. Many others gave up their lives to the ravages of disease before they reached the battle front, and many others are asleep in the deep.

Hundreds of the sons of Florida bear the honorable scars of battle—decorations more honorable than any decoration conferred by government, prince, or potentate. Among those who fought a good fight and by the providence of God was privileged to return to the home of his fathers, with no mark of the conflict upon him except the mark of duty well performed, is Sumter L. Lowry, jr., of Tampa, Fla., a captain in the Second Florida Regiment, National Guard, who saw service on the Mexican border in 1916, and who led his company again to the service of his country in the great World War and to the battle fields of France. It affords me unusual pleasure to propose his name as one of the incorporators of the American Legion, knowing, as I do, that this will meet the approbation of his comrades in arms, who have officially indorsed him, as well as his fellow citizens in civil life. He was a brave soldier; he is a splendid citizen, a gallant gentleman.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, there is another amendment at the Clerk's desk, designed to perfect the English of section 2.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 7, line 23, after the word "and," strike out "by the doing of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "to do."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That no person shall be a member of this corporation unless he served in the naval or military service of the United States at some time during the period between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, both dates inclusive, or served in the military or naval services of any of the governments associated with the United States during the Great War, who were citizens of the United States at the time of enlistment.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 9, line 7, after the word "and," strike out "November 11, 1918," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The date of the conclusion of the Great War, to be evidenced by the proclamation of the President of the United States."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, the existing language in section 5 limits the opportunity of membership in this organization to those who were in the service between the date when the United States entered the so-called Great War and November 11, 1918, the date of the signing of the armistice. I think we should extend that to include especially those who have been sent overseas in the capacity of physicians or nurses to help those of the American Army who theretofore had gone to France and the countries overseas. Under the limitations of the present language of the bill nobody could become a member of this organization unless he served within the limits of time between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918. Many men and many women have gone abroad since November 11, 1918, and are ministering in the highest and best sense of the word to the success of American arms and civilization throughout the world by helping the boys who have been there for a year or more. I think that a man or a woman who has gone abroad since November 11, 1918, as a physician, as a hospital attendant, or as a nurse in the service of the United States, duly enlisted, and given honorable mention and award in the service of the United States, should be eligible to admission into this patriotic organization, and that to refuse them is drawing the limit in too narrow a degree. Therefore I have asked that the words "November 11, 1918," be stricken out and in their stead be placed "the date when the war shall have been concluded, to be evidenced by the proclamation of the President of the United States." I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Would not that let in anybody who has enlisted in the Army or Navy since the signing of the armistice?

Mr. GARD. Yes; it would, and properly so.

Mr. HAYDEN. What risk of any bodily injury, or what wartime risk, has anyone run who entered the service since November 11? Were there any submarines in the ocean?

Mr. GARD. There are hundreds of men who sat at desks within the safe precincts of the city of Washington during the whole war, or who sat amid social surroundings in the city of Paris, who did not run half as much risk as a little nurse who went from the United States on the 1st of December, 1918, and gave her life in order that the lives of others in fever-infected hospitals might be saved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARD) there were—ayes 51, noes 34.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SIEGEL: Page 9, line 10, after the word "war" strike out the comma, insert a period, and strike out the balance of the paragraph.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, the reasons which have led me to offer the amendment just read is that if the language in section 5 remains as it is now there will be some doubt as to whether the two hundred and some odd thousand aliens who entered the Army, and who were naturalized under the act of Congress, could become members of this legion, because we use in the section the following language, "who were citizens of the United States at the time of enlistment."

I think it is only fair to those two hundred and odd thousand men, who were made citizens under the act of Congress, that they should be permitted to become a part of this legion.

Mr. BAER. Is it not true that many of these men enlisted who were not citizens had already made application for their citizenship papers?

Mr. SIEGEL. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BAER. And is it not a fact that after they became citizens, even though they were not citizens when they enlisted, they should have a right to joint the organization?

Mr. SIEGEL. There can be no dispute about that. We passed an act of Congress permitting them to become citizens and encouraged them to serve our country.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the gentleman is also aware of the fact that one of the purposes of this great organization is that of Americanization, and we want to take these boys who were drafted and who fought in our Army, but who were not citizens, and make them loyal American citizens. It is not the purpose of the American Legion to limit it to citizenship, and I urge the acceptance of the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SIEGEL. My colleague expresses the facts as they are.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is it not the object of this section to provide that the language "who were citizens of the United States at the time of enlistment" is applicable to those who served in armies of Governments associated with the United States?

Mr. SIEGEL. In view of the fact that the sentence applies to the whole section, I think it includes the others as well.

Mr. BEE. If it does, then I think the gentleman's amendment ought to be accepted.

Mr. BAER. If we substitute "residents" for "citizens" would that not fix it?

Mr. SIEGEL. No; some men were in other armies. Take the Czecho-Slovaks, for instance. At the special request of our Government they were sent to Siberia and other places.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Would not this amendment answer the purpose: In line 10, after the word "were," add the words "or have since become" and strike out the last words, "at the time of enlistment"?

Mr. SIEGEL. The reason why I think that would not reach the point is that the Naturalization Bureau is behind at the present time in getting out final papers for thousands of these men who are becoming citizens. There are many men who have not secured their final papers from the Bureau of Naturalization on account of lack of adequate force.

Mr. EMERSON. Several thousand Americans served in the Canadian Army, and they would come in under this language.

Mr. SIEGEL. There is no doubt about that. We passed two acts here—one to give back their citizenship to those who had gone abroad and fought, and we passed a second act providing that the alien who entered the Army should be made a citizen by virtue of his service.

Mr. BEE. I would suggest to the gentleman that if he will read carefully in section 5 he will find that it carries the suggestion that any person who served in the military or naval service of the United States between April, 1917, and November, 1918, or the proclamation of peace as amended, is eligible to membership, regardless of citizenship, but that the words "who were citizens of the United States at the time of enlistment" applies to those who fought in the associated armies.

Mr. SIEGEL. I want to say to the gentleman that if that is the proper interpretation, then my amendment can do no harm, and if it is not, then we should not be engaged here in incorporating an organization which would apparently be giving certain men who fought in the war greater rights than the others.

Mr. BEE. I think the gentleman is confusing it.

Mr. SIEGEL. No. I am not. My idea is that every man who fought in this war who became a citizen should be permitted to enter this legion.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's motion, as I understand it, is to strike out, in line 10, after the word "war," the words "who were citizens of the United States at the time of enlistment." If that is stricken out and nothing else put in, then you are going to make every person who served in the army of any nation associated with the United States eligible to membership in this order. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's idea, and would suggest this, if he will adopt it: In line 8, after the word "or," insert the words "who being citizens of the United States at the time of enlistment," so that it would read "or, who being citizens of the United States at the time of enlistment, served in the military or naval services of any of the governments associated with the United States during the Great War."

Mr. SIEGEL. I accept that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. And strike out the words in lines 10 and 11 that the gentleman has already moved to strike out.

Mr. SIEGEL. I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment in that respect.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by substituting the words which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 8, after the first word "or," insert the words "who, being citizens of the United States at the time of enlistment."

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I would suggest that the gentleman wants to make a motion to strike out all after the word "War," in lines 10 and 11, because you are simply taking those words and putting them after the word "or" in the eighth line. That makes it perfectly clear. You transpose that sentence up into line 8.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIEGEL. I would ask the Clerk to report section 5 as it would read with the amendment in.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no person shall be a member of this incorporation unless he served in the naval or military service of the United States at some time during the period between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, both dates inclusive, or who, being a citizen of the United States at the time of enlistment, served in the military or naval services of any of the Governments associated with the United States during the Great War."

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, the comma in line 7 ought to be made a semicolon. That would carry out our intention.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the comma be changed to a semicolon.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, the Clerk in reading the revised amendment did not include the Gard amendment. Was not the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio adopted? That should have been read instead of the date as read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. That has been adopted. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the comma after the word "War" and insert a period.

Mr. SIEGEL. That is included in my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to change the comma after the word "War" to a period. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move, on page 9, line 5, to strike out the word "he" and insert "such person."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EMERSON: On page 9, line 5, strike out the word "he" and insert in lieu thereof the words "such person."

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I think from what my colleague from Ohio [Mr. GARD] said this is to be an organization in which the women and men both join, and if that be true the word "he" should be stricken out and the words "such person" placed in.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does it not imply women?

Mr. GARD. I think it is intended that those who were women who had seen service by enlistment in the Army or Navy should be entitled to membership in this organization, and I think it is the intention of the organization that they should be accorded membership. I believe the word "he" as used here includes the feminine expression.

Mr. EMERSON. I agree that the women ought to be permitted to join. There is no constructive section and oftentimes in the law——

Mr. GARD. I think there is no doubt of that.

Mr. EMERSON. I know; but there is no part of this law that provides that the word "he" shall mean "she."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They are in the organization now.

Mr. EMERSON. Why should——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Because the masculine embraces the feminine.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That the organization shall be nonpolitical and, as an organization, shall not promote the candidacy of any person seeking public office.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question. If one man were running for office and he defeated another man and it was brought out after election that this organization supported the man who was elected, might this man who was defeated bring suit against this organization because they were compelled to stay out of politics? [Laughter.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; there will be no danger of that.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That said corporation may acquire any or all the assets of the existing unincorporated national organization known as the "American Legion" upon discharging or satisfactorily providing for the payment and discharge of all its liabilities.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest an amendment to the amendment which was offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL]. Every man who served in the Army or the Navy of the United States should be entitled to membership in this organization. Many good men served in the Army or Navy of the United States who were not citizens of this country who have become citizens since, possibly, or will become citizens of the United States, and it seems to me that those men are also entitled to membership in this organization, and the bill should plainly state it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They are entitled under the law. This only refers to Americans who served in other armies, boys who served in the English and French Army, like the Lafayette Escadrille.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Yes; but it states here men who are citizens of the United States——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In other armies. Everybody in our own Army.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That said corporation and its State and local subdivisions shall have the sole and exclusive right to have and to use in carrying out its purposes the name the "American Legion": Provided, That nothing in this act shall interfere or conflict with established or vested rights.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to report the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 9, line 23, after the word "Legion," strike out the balance of the section.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the words "Provided, That nothing in this act shall interfere or conflict with established or vested rights" are meaningless. There are no established or vested rights.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is no objection.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the said corporation shall, on or before the 1st day of January in each year, make and transmit to the Congress a report of its proceedings for the preceding calendar year, including a full and complete report of its receipts and expenditures: Provided, however, That said report shall not be printed as public documents.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out everything on line 5 after the word "expenditures," and all of line 6.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 10, line 5, after the word "expenditures," strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. BEE. In the first place, what is the necessity for section 9 at all? These gentlemen are patriots and have their own organization. Why should Congress want them to make a report to Congress as to what they have been doing with their own money and their own affairs; and, in the next place, if they do make that report to Congress, why should we make them public documents that will be frankable through the mails? What is the purpose?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will answer the gentleman frankly.

Mr. BEE. It occurs to me, if the gentleman will permit me, that section 9 ought to go out altogether and let this patriotic organization conduct its own business and not be running to Congress and telling Congress what it has done.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not know what the purpose of this section 9 is. I had nothing to do with the drawing of the bill. But if Congress desires an annual report, I think Congress should have it. And I am frank to say that I am trying to get for this organization the privilege of franking such report. I state it frankly.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out section 9.

The SPEAKER. The amendment to perfect the paragraph must be acted upon first.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that all debate on this section be now closed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate on this section be now closed.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to speak for three minutes in support of the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE].

Mr. BEE. Do I understand that the gentleman from Minnesota in charge of the bill moves to close all debate on section 9 and have no debate whatever on section 9, under the gentleman's will?

Mr. GARD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] moved to strike out the proviso.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that all debate on this section close in 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that all debate on this section close in 10 minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] and in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE].

Section 9 provides for the transmission to Congress of a report of the proceedings and expenses of this organization for the year. When the proponents of this organization were before the Committee on the Judiciary, they said they, of course, supposed they were to file a report, and they wanted to file a report. They did not care to file a report with the Secretary of War, because they assumed that was rather an indirect method of getting the report to Congress; but when the suggestion was made that they file a report directly with Congress, they accepted that suggestion, and they not alone were willing to file a report with Congress but they wanted Congress to be advised yearly of what they were doing.

Now, it seems to me that when the Congress of the United States goes so far afield, as it is going afield, as to grant a Federal incorporation—because it is an unusual grant—then the Congress of the United States should at least exercise supervision over the organization to the extent that the report should be made to it, and the report should come every year.

Only a few weeks ago we granted a charter of incorporation to the Society of the Near East, an assemblage of men who are spending in charity in the Near East sums of money secured entirely by voluntary contributions. Not a cent of the money of the United States Government is used in the charitable work of the Society of the Near East. It will do a wonderful work among those stricken people. And yet we required them, as we do in section 8 of this bill, to transmit to the Congress each year a report of their proceedings for the year ending December 31 preceding, including in such report the names and residences of the officers and a full and itemized account of all receipts and expenditures. It is the proper thing for Congress to do when it invests any corporation with the sanctity of the approval of the whole United States of America, and I think it should be retained in this bill; and the people who want the bill as an entirety want to make the report for their own protection, and you can not successfully curry favor with or have the approval of the gentlemen who are back of this bill by striking out the proviso about requiring the report, because they themselves want to make the report.

Now, as to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], this language about providing that it shall not be used as a public document was put in because it was thought that the documents might be franked too indiscriminately and promiscuously, to the impediment of the office of the Public Printer. I do not share in that view. I think if this document comes in, in the interest of all those concerned it is but fair to say that this report might go out under the honored frank of the Representatives in the Congress of the United States and the Senators of the United States to their constituents or those who might be interested.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], a man who knows no fear in danger's dark and storm. Much that he said is of great weight, but the idea of this incorporation is to solidify all of the various branches of the American armed force. If we do not do this there will spring up all over the country organizations of volunteers who served overseas, organizations of National Guardsmen who served overseas, organizations of the Regular Army who served overseas, organizations of marines who served overseas, and organizations of marines who went to Russia, and organizations of each of these who stayed in the United States; and the result will be that instead of solidifying sentiment among that great body of men, that instead of having every man who wore the uniform of his country at the time of its greatest peril standing before the world and saying, "This man was my buddy and was ready to die with me," we will have a division of sentiment and we will tear down that great thing that has come to us, because all American men, women, and children went to battle for the liberty of the world and by their valor and by their united efforts they won this victory which is so great that even the angels in heaven sing their praises, and I would not under any circumstances deny these men this great opportunity to coordinate and cooperate on an equal footing. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BEE and Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana rose.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I wish to offer, to strike out section 9, but I understood the Speaker to say it was not in order at this time.

The SPEAKER. It is not now in order.

Mr. BEE. Then I assume I will be permitted to offer it later?

The SPEAKER. The Chair makes no promises.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote against this bill, no matter how it may be amended. I think we are undertaking in this bill to organize the veterans of the Great War. I am rather inclined to believe that the veterans can take care of themselves and organize themselves as they see fit and proper.

I do not take the same gloomy view of the situation as was taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] who has just preceded me. I learn from history, sir, that after the great Civil War there sprang up, North and South, a great number of organizations of men who had worn the blue and men who had worn the gray, and after several years had passed these various organizations, North and South, met in their own way, and out of their deliberations grew the Grand Army of the Republic of the North, representing those who had fought on the northern side, and the United Confederate Veterans, representing those who had fought under the flag of the Confederacy. Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that we have absolutely no right, not in a legal way, but we have no moral right, to undertake to say how the veterans of the World War are to organize themselves. There is not a single power conferred in this bill upon the gentlemen named that they have not already at hand. They can meet in Indianapolis, New Orleans, Minneapolis, or anywhere they want to, and they can organize an American Legion and they can ask every man who fought to join it if he sees fit, and other gentlemen can meet at other places to organize other societies and associations, and in the final analysis you will never force by congressional action 4,000,000 men to go into this organization unless they want to go. This is a legislative attempt to force the men who wore the uniform of their country to go into one organization by giving it the stamp of approval of the American Congress. Let the men in the various counties organize their posts, let the men in the States organize, and after a while we will have a great national organization that has grown up from the heartbeat and the sentiment surrounding the men who fought in this war. It will be a spontaneous organization and will not look as if it had been forced upon them. I have talked to men who have fought across the seas, men who do not believe in being thus organized, men who will resent such action by Congress. We can not force the men who stopped the Germans to join any society or association unless they wish so to do.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, the measure before the House was not inspired by Members of Congress, but was and is the bill of the soldiers themselves. This bill is the voluntary production of the soldiers of the Great War. The soldiers held their initial meeting in Paris, and then when they had come home they held at St. Louis a great convention, constituted of delegates and representatives from every section of the country, from the North and the South, the eastern country and the western country. They assembled there and after a memorable meeting, that all of you must have heard of through the public press, they resolved themselves into an organization with a specific name and purpose. They appointed men whose business it was to go before a committee of the House of Representatives and present their claims.

They have asked us for a charter. They have requested that they be created into a body corporate, in order that there might be the responsibility and in order that there might be the prestige and the dignity given by a charter issued by act of the Federal Congress to men who have rendered conspicuous and distinguished service in the greatest war of all time. These soldiers came before our committee as volunteers. Their organization had prepared the measure and they themselves advocated it, and the Committee on the Judiciary heard them patiently day after day and after conference revised their bill, and then these soldiers in every particular approved the form in which the measure was ultimately cast by the committee. So that the measure now before you is the bill of the war veterans who ask to be organized into an incorporation under grant of the Congress of the United States; and any man who opposes that measure is opposing a bill that the soldiers themselves have dictated and which they ask to be crystallized into law.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Is it the wish of the veterans that there be included in their membership the men who are now being recruited into the Army and the Navy, as provided for by the Gard amendment?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. No. The bill was only intended to cover the cases of men of all classes—regardless of race—from every section and of every branch of the Army, who rendered patriotic service to this Government during the Great War. It was intended only to include the men who rendered service in the war just concluded. There is no reason why those who may engage in future wars shall not effect a similar organization and be incorporated by Federal enactments under some other name, but this corporation is supposed to cover and to include only the men who rendered a service to our Government in this World War through which we have just passed. In the selection of the charter members of this corporation, as designated in section 1—and I presume as amended—they took men from every branch of the service, without distinction as to rank—officer and private alike—so that this organization will be a popular body—a group of men who will act as charter members to supervise and superintend the initial meeting, the first meeting of the stockholders, when all may attend and be heard, when all shall participate and have a voice and a vote in the proceedings, to the end that they may erect one great organization of which all of the units of the combined forces will be members.

For these brave and valiant soldiers I have the profoundest respect and admiration. I wish them Godspeed and good luck. I say "all hail" to the American veterans of the great World War. There is nothing too good for them.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, I want to present in a few moments my reasons for offering to strike out section 9 of the bill. I am not going to debate the bill itself. The authority of Congress to grant a charter of this kind is at least in serious doubt, but I am not going into that question. It is provided in section 6 that this organization shall be nonpolitical and shall not promote the candidacy of anyone seeking public office. The Sons of the Revolution, the Sons of the War of 1812, the Sons of the Mexican War, the Grand Army of the Republic, the Spanish War Veterans have never had corporate powers granted to them. Section 9 for the first time in the history of this country contemplates that a purely patriotic organization, composed of gallant men who put their lives in the balance that this Government and civilization might live, shall be required, in order for them to secure a concession from Congress, to report to Congress what they have done with the money that they have collected, from whom they have collected it, and how they have distributed it. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], in opposition to this amendment, suggests that a man need not think that he is currying favor with these soldiers by trying to move to strike out section 9. I want to say that any man in this House who votes for or against this bill or any section thereof in order to court the favor of any man in this country is unfit to be a Member of the American Congress. Are you going to incorporate a nonpolitical patriotic organization and require them to report to Congress the money that they have collected and what they have done with it, and under the amendment of the gentleman from New York make that report frankable in order that it may be sent throughout the country by Members of Congress? Shall Members of Congress then be able to obtain from the Public Printer bound volumes of reports of this patriotic organization and send them broadcast to admiring constituents, who will see the name of the Member written in the upper right-hand corner and be impressed with the solicitude that that particular Congressman has for them?

The gentleman from Mississippi, who has been the father of garden seed, had best retire hereafter and let the gentleman from New York take his place, because there will be sent out millions of documents under a frank.

But, aside from that, I think this organization is what it is proposed to be—a nonpolitical patriotic organization of the splendid men and women who constituted the armed forces of the United States. Why should Congress require this organization year after year to file a report to this Congress of the money that they have collected, of their proceedings, who made speeches, who did not, and what they have done with the money and from whom they got it? I submit that not only should it not be frankable, but that there is no place in this bill for such a provision. This bill is going to pass, and I expect ought to pass in spite of the doubt as to the right of Congress to grant this charter. There is no reason why you should make Congress the receptacle of the proceedings of this or any other purely social and patriotic organization. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from New York that makes their proceedings frankable as public documents will be rejected, and I appeal to the Congress of the United States not to break the precedents of a century and require a purely patriotic, social organization, whether they want to or not, to render a report to Congress as to what they have done and why inside of their organization. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I move that all debate on the bill and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves that all debate on the bill and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. HEFLIN. What is that amendment?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 10, line 5, after the word "expenditures" strike out the balance of section.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LAGUARDIA) there were—ayes 16, noes 110.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEE: Page 10, strike out all of section 9.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BEE) there were—ayes 48, noes 73.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 10, line 6, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 9½. The principal office of the corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but offices may be maintained and meetings of the corporation or of the trustees and committees may be held in other places, such as their by-laws may from time to time fix."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 10, after line 6, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 9½. That, as a condition precedent to the exercise of any power or privilege herein granted or conferred, the American Legion shall file in the office of the secretary of state of each State the name and post-office address of an authorized agent in such State upon whom legal process or demand against the American Legion may be served."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for five minutes to explain this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the House the right to cut off debate on a section before it is reached under the five-minute rule?

The SPEAKER. The House voted to cut off debate.

Mr. WINGO. But we are operating under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. The House, by unanimous consent, is operating under the five-minute rule; but we are not in Committee of the Whole. We are in the House.

Mr. WINGO. But we are operating under the five-minute rule. How can we cut off debate before we reach a section?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House can do that. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. VOLSTEAD) there were—ayes 77, noes 42.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the right to repeal, alter, or amend this act at any time is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I desire to move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman reserve that for a moment? I want to offer a motion which I think will greatly help untangle the bill. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] was agreed to. It is on page 9, line 7, and strikes out the words "November 11, 1918," and inserts the date of the conclusion of the war, to be evidenced by the proclamation of the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota moves to reconsider the vote by which the House adopted the amendment stated.

Mr. GARD. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. We can not reconsider an amendment which has been agreed to under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BAER. We are in the House now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think that as we are operating under the five-minute rule we can not return to a section that has been passed, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WINGO. We can reconsider any vote on the bill before it is finally passed.

The SPEAKER. On the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Upon any question under consideration during the consideration of the bill. To refuse to do so would cut off the right of reconsideration absolutely, which is a very fundamental right. The Chair will remember that we are in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. BAER. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be right to permit the men who are now enlisting in the Army to join the American Legion, which is an organization composed of the soldiers who served during the time that we were actually at war with the Central Powers.

For example, under the Gard amendment I could resign from Congress to-morrow, enlist in the Army, and before another legislative body of this country will have ratified the peace treaty I would have the right to join the American Legion.

Mr. GARD. Would the gentleman exclude the men in Siberia, who have been there for the last two or three months, some who are there——

Mr. BAER. If it is legal for them to be there, Congress should declare another war. Then there could be a legion of the Russian war veterans. I do not think anybody under the Constitution has a right to keep them there, as we have not officially made a declaration of war. Every man who served in Russia was also in the service before November 11, 1918, and thus will be eligible to the American Legion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio was agreed to.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. VOLSTEAD) there were—ayes 91, noes 37.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment——

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. VOLSTEAD) there were—ayes 84, noes 49.

ADJOURNMENT.

Accordingly the House (at 5 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) adjourned to meet to-morrow, Thursday, August 21, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the calendar and committee therein named, as follows:

Mr. BARKLEY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2700) granting the consent of Congress to the D. E. Hewit Lumber Co. to construct and maintain a bridge across Tug River, connecting Martin County, Ky., and Mingo County, W. Va., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 242), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5000) to allow credit for husbands' military service in case of homestead entries by widows, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 243), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SMITH of Idaho, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6772) authorizing and directing the transfer of 10 acres of land to rural high school district No. 1, Lapwai, Idaho, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 244), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8134) granting an increase of pension to Samuel T. Pate; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (S. 767) for the relief of the heirs of W. H. Sneed; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: A bill (H. R. 8572) to provide for the protection of the citizens of the United States by the suspension of immigration, for the deportation of additional classes of aliens, for the registration of aliens, for the admission by passport of certain aliens, for the admission of certain aliens on the signing of a preliminary admission statement, to further regulate the residence of aliens in the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. CANNON: A bill (H. R. 8573) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Milford, Ill., one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: A bill (H. R. 8574) to amend section 231 of the act of February 24, 1919, entitled "An act to provide revenue, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan: A bill (H. R. 8575) to provide that in the construction and application of the pension laws a soldier, sailor, or marine shall be considered in sound condition when examined, accepted, and enrolled for service; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CRAGO: A bill (H. R. 8576) to incorporate the Veterans of Foreign Wars; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 8577) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8578) to amend section 11 of act 314, approved March 1, 1919, entitled "An act making appropriation for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. STEVENSON: A bill (H. R. 8579) providing for the erection of a monument at Cowpens battle ground, Cherokee County, S. C., commemorative of Gen. Daniel Morgan and those who participated in the Battle of Cowpens on the 17th day of January, 1781; to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. SINNOTT: A bill (H. R. 8580) to authorize the reservation of the lands needed for the protection of municipal water supply; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. MADDEN: A bill (H. R. 8581) for the reduction of postage on first-class mail matter; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. SEARS: A bill (H. R. 8582) for the erection of a Federal building at Kissimmee, Oceola County, Fla.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8583) for the erection of a Federal building at St. Augustine, St. Johns County, Fla.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 8584) for the erection of a Federal building at Key West, Monroe County, Fla.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. NEWTON of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 8585) to amend paragraph A, section 628, of the revenue act of 1918, approved February 24, 1919; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. PLATT: A bill (H. R. 8586) to amend sections 3, 8, 10, 20, and 21 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. DALLINGER: A bill (H. R. 8587) to restore to the colors and granting amnesty to soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain other persons, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee: Petition of Knoxville Iron Co., manufacturers of iron and steel bars and chains, by W. P. Davis, of Knoxville, Tenn., favoring tariff protection, especially on chains; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 21, 1919.

Rev. John Paul Tyler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O Lord God of our fathers, command, we beseech Thee, this day Thy blessing, Thy grace and wisdom, that in all that shall be said and done this day Thy name may be glorified, that justice and righteousness may prevail in our land and throughout and among the nations of the world, that the day of peace and good will may soon come to bless the sons of men. To this end bless us, keep us, guide us. Bless our President; bless our Nation and every home in it. We ask it in Jesus' name. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting schedules and list of papers, documents, and so forth, on the files of the Treasury Department which are not needed in the transaction of public business and which are devoid of historic interest or value, and requesting action looking to their disposition. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, and the Chair appoints the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] the committee on the part of the Senate. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives thereof.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Senate joint resolution 2, favoring the establishment of a league of nations to enforce peace and promote the liberty, progress, and orderly development of the world.

Whereas the war now brought to a victorious close by the associated powers of the free nations of the world was above all else a war to end war and protect human rights: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Utah (both houses concurring), That we favor the establishment of a league of nations of which the United States shall be a member. We believe that such a league should aim at promoting the liberty, progress, and orderly development of the world; that it should clinch the victory won at such terrible sacrifice by having the united potential force of all its members as a standing menace against any nation that seeks to upset the peace of the world; be it further

Resolved, That we indorse the course taken by the President of the United States as the recognized leader of this movement, and as the internationally acclaimed spokesman for the aspirations and ideals of the masses of mankind in personally attending the peace conference; be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be sent by the secretary of state to the President of the United States and to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress and to each of the United States Senators and Representatives from the State of Utah.

(Passed Jan. 17, 1919. Approved Jan. 27, 1919. In effect Jan. 27, 1919.)

Mr. KING. I present a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Utah, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial 2, memorializing the Congress of the United States for the passage of an amendment to the bill introduced by Senator BANKHEAD in the United States Senate on December 4, 1918, known as S. 5088, also the same amendment to a bill introduced in the United States Senate by Senator SWANSON on December 5, 1919, known as S. 5098, also the same amendment to a bill introduced by Mr. SHACKLEFORD in the House of Representatives of the United States on December 12, 1918, known as H. R. 13354, and also to any other similar bills introduced in Congress, in order to provide a more equitable application of Federal aid for post roads in the sparsely settled States, and to provide a more reasonable time limit for the availability of such Federal aid.

We, your memorialists, the House of Representatives and the Senate of the State of Utah, respectfully represent that:

Whereas there are pending in the Congress of the United States bills known as S. 5088 and S. 5098 and H. R. 13354, all of which provide for additional Federal aid for post roads under the terms of the act of Congress approved July 11, 1916, and commonly known as the Federal aid road act; and

Whereas section 6 of said Federal aid road act provides that the United States shall not cooperate in any road project in an amount greater than 50 per cent of the total estimated cost thereof; and

Whereas, although additional Federal aid for road building at the present time is highly desirable, nevertheless those States having large areas and relatively small population will be unable to avail themselves of the benefits of this act as amended to provide additional Federal aid without a disproportionate burden of taxation;

Now, therefore, your memorialists urgently request that the said bills, and any other similar bills which may be introduced in the Congress of the United States, be so amended that section 6 of the said Federal aid road act will provide that in those States where the average population per square mile of area is 100 persons or more, based upon the census of 1910, the United States shall not cooperate in any road project in an amount greater than 50 per cent of the total estimated cost thereof; and that in those States where the average population per square mile of area, based on the census of 1910, is less than 100 persons, the share of the United States shall be increased one-fourth of 1 per cent for each person, or major fraction thereof, less than 100 per square mile; and furthermore

Whereas section 3 of said Federal aid road act provides that so much of the appropriation apportioned to any State for any fiscal year as remains unexpended at the close thereof shall be available to such State only until the close of the succeeding fiscal year; and

Whereas on account of the said provision of section 3 of said act local conditions existing in some States render it practically impossible to comply with the terms of the act;

Now, therefore, your memorialists also request that said bills now pending in Congress, and any other similar bills which may be introduced, be amended so that section 3 of the said Federal aid road act will provide that so much of the appropriation to any State for any fiscal year as remains unexpended at the close thereof shall be available to such State until the close of the second succeeding fiscal year; and be it

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be sent to each of the members of the congressional delegation from the State of Utah to the Congress of the United States and to each body of said Congress.

(Passed Jan. 31, 1919. Approved Feb. 6, 1919. In effect Feb. 6, 1919.)

Mr. KING. I present a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Utah, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF UTAH, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
SECRETARY OF STATE'S OFFICE.

I, Harden Bennion, secretary of state of the State of Utah, do hereby certify that the attached is a full, true, and correct copy of house joint resolution 8 as appears on file in my office.

House joint resolution 8, petitioning the War Department of the United States Government to designate the Utah Agricultural College as a permanent site for a summer training camp of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

Whereas the policy of the War Department of the United States of America is to encourage the participation of its citizens in the movement for the defense of the Nation and especially to encourage the development of military training in the colleges of America in such a way as not to interfere with the training and efficiency of the students in the various professions and vocations of civilian life; and

Whereas one of the measures looking toward this end is the establishment of summer training camps for the college students of America looking toward the preparing of these students for military and technical leadership in time of war, it being the object in these training camps to concentrate into a short period of time, in order not to seriously interfere with the civilian responsibilities of the students, the military and scientific training necessary for proficiency in time of war; and

Whereas the Utah Agricultural College is recognized as possessing advantages necessary for the proper feeding and housing of men and for the supervision of the men in a moral and social way, and it is recognized that the location of the college in the center of the intermountain region makes it a convenient site for the purposes mentioned herein: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Utah (the Senate concurring therein), That the State Legislature of Utah hereby petition the United States War Department to designate the Utah Agricultural College, at Logan, Utah, as one of the permanent sites for the location of a summer training camp of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and the board of trustees of the Utah Agricultural College is hereby authorized to enter into cooperative agreements with the War Department or such other departments of the Federal Government as are necessary for the establishment and operation of the military training herein mentioned.

House joint memorial 5, petitioning the Congress of the United States to provide for the proper restraint, control, employment, and education of certain renegade Indians in the San Juan region of Utah.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the governor and the Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully represent:

Whereas there is now and ever since the settlement of San Juan County, State of Utah, has been roaming over said county a renegade band of Ute Indians, which lawless Indians have never been confined to any reservation or governed by any law.

Nor have they been under supervision or restraint of any Indian agency, but at all times have been allowed to roam at will over said county, occasionally going to the agency at Navajo Springs, Colo., to receive their annuities, but returning immediately to San Juan County, where for many years and up to the present time they have indulged in the nefarious practice of killing cattle and sheep, the property of white settlers; breaking into and robbing sheep camps and the cabins of cattlemen maintained for the storing of provisions and other necessaries for the protection and welfare of cattle and the range. They break into and rob sheep camps maintained by sheepmen; break into and pasture their horses on the farms of settlers, regardless of the destruction wrought. These lawless Indians kill and rob white settlers to the extent that in the last 25 years at least 30 people have been killed while engaged in pursuit of Indians to recover stolen property. None of those Indians have ever been brought to justice and they rob and murder among themselves without fear of punishment by the civil authorities.

They are constantly armed with high-powered rifles and supplied with plenty of ammunition. While so armed in February of 1915, when the arrest of one of their number was attempted, an encounter took place which resulted in the death of one white man, the wounding of a second, and the death of two Indians; and

Whereas at the present time there is very great danger of an outbreak between said lawless Indian band and the white settlers of that locality, which will inevitably result in the needless loss of life, both to the Indians and to the authorities who undertake to deal with them; and

Whereas the children of said Indians have never been trained according to the methods now employed by the Interior Department of the United States for the education of Indian children, and the children of said Indians can not be schooled according to such methods so long as they are permitted to roam without restraint of any nature, but, on the other hand, they continue to grow more defiant of law and more bold in the commission of crime, both among themselves and against the white settlers:

Therefore your memorialists, in the name of the people of the State of Utah, and particularly on behalf of the people of San Juan County, hereby petition your honorable body that these lawless Indians be taken in charge by the Government of the United States pursuant to laws and statutes regulating the Indian population; that they be confined to the Ute Reservation, or such other reservation as may be available for the purpose; that they be restrained from roaming at large as they have heretofore done and are now doing; that they be provided with such educational advantages and such employment as will fit them for proper living; and that such other necessary action be taken by the United States Government to control said Indians as will give relief to the people of San Juan County from further menace of the unlawful acts.

Mr. KING. I present a resolution passed by the Legislature of the State of Utah, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF UTAH, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
SECRETARY OF STATE'S OFFICE.

I, Harden Bennion, secretary of state of the State of Utah, do hereby certify that the attached is a full, true, and correct copy of senate joint memorial No. 3 as appears on file in my office.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Utah this 16th day of August, 1919.

Senate joint memorial 3, urging the passage of a bill relating to reclamation projects for benefit of returning soldiers and sailors.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Utah, respectfully represent that—

Whereas the Honorable Secretary of the Interior has requested the immediate passage of a bill appropriating the sum of $100,000,000, to be employed on reclamation projects for the benefit of returning soldiers and sailors; and

Whereas such an undertaking is not only commendable as a practicable recognition of a patriotic service rendered, but alike meritorious in that it would place unproductive land in the productive lists, a distinctively governmental function: Now, therefore,

Your memorialists do advise, recommend, and request that the measure herein referred to be passed by your honorable body with the celerity that its merit justifies, and thus meet a situation that has already arisen, the importance of which is being daily emphasized at every American port of debarkation.

It is directed that this memorial be enrolled and one copy sent to the President of the United States, one copy to the President of the Senate, and one copy to the Speaker of the House, one copy to the honorable Secretary of the Interior, one copy to the House chairman of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands, one copy to the Senate chairman of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, and one copy to the Senators and Congressmen representing the State of Utah.

(Passed Feb. 18, 1919. Approved Feb. 28, 1919. In effect Feb. 28, 1919.)

CUMBERLAND RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 8076) authorizing the county of Montgomery, Tenn., to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River within 7 miles of Clarksville, Tenn., and I submit a report (No. 154) thereon. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered at this time.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Montgomery, Tenn., be and is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Cumberland River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, and within a distance of 7 miles from Clarksville, Tenn., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," and approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUSQUEHANNA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 8117) for the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Falls, Wyoming County, Pa., and I submit a report (No. 155) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Susquehanna River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, and at or near Falls, Wyoming County, Pa., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HENDERSON:

A bill (S. 2850) to authorize the addition of certain lands to the Humboldt National Forest, in the State of Nevada; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. HARRIS:

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

A bill (S. 2861) for the relief of the Davis Construction Co.; and

A bill (S. 2862) for the relief of the Sanford & Brooks Co. (Inc.); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 2863) for the relief of the heirs of Stephen G. Burbridge, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 2864) granting a pension to Clint T. Littlefield;

A bill (S. 2865) granting an increase of pension to Jacob T. Martin; and

A bill (S. 2866) granting an increase of pension to Bowman R. Butcher (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. McNARY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PROFITEERING IN FOODSTUFFS AND WAR CONTRACTS.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I submit a resolution proposing an amendment to Senate resolution 159 and Senate joint resolution 92, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 171) was read, as follows:

Whereas there is widespread discontent due to the general belief that since our country declared war against Germany on April 6, 1917, there has been profiteering carried on by American citizens on an extensive scale; and

Whereas there is a very general belief throughout the country that the profiteering in foodstuffs and the necessities of life is in part responsible for the present excessive cost of living prevailing in this country and for the growth of un-American theories; and

Whereas there is a general demand throughout the country that the persons, partnerships, and corporations engaged in making excessive profits at a time when millions of American families were sacrificing and suffering for the cause of our country, and millions of American youths were serving in the Army and Navy of the United States, all of whom were ready to make every necessary sacrifice—and, in fact, many thousands of them did sacrific their health, their limbs, and their lives for the preservation and protection of America's honor—should be known to the public in order that the people of this country may have in their possession the names of the persons, partnerships, and corporations who took advantage of the distressed condition of their country during the war to amass wealth, as well as by such publicity to prevent a repetition of profiteering in any future crisis in the history of our country; and

Whereas the obtaining of evidence of profiteering is most difficult because such testimony must come in great part from those charged with such unpatriotic practices, but, nevertheless, there is in the possession of the Government such evidence, only obtainable by an order of the President of the United States, that would assist in detecting where and by whom excessive profits were made: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Senate resolution 159 and Senate joint resolution 92, providing for the appointment of a committee to investigate the high cost of living, be amended by adding the following:

"Resolved further, That the President of the United States is hereby requested to issue, under the authority conferred on him by subsection (b) of section 14 of Public Statute No. 271 of the Sixty-fourth Congress, entitled 'An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes,' an order giving said committee full access to the income-tax returns of all corporations, partnerships, and individuals engaged in the large-scale production or distribution of food products or having contracts with the Government for the furnishing of military or other supplies.

"Resolved further, That said committee be authorized to annex to its report a list of all persons who were employed since April 6, 1917, by the Government either under a regular salary or on a one-dollar-a-year basis, to whom Government contracts were issued either as individuals or to any partnership or corporation with which said individuals were connected either as members, directors, or stockholders, showing also who, if any, of said individuals were connected with any governmental department having contractual relations with the partnerships or corporations of which they were members, shareholders, or directors, and, further, what profits the income-tax returns of said individuals, partnerships, or corporations having contractual relations with the Government or other evidence may disclose as to the extent of their profits; and

"Resolved further, That said committee annex to its report a list of all other persons, partnerships, and corporations who have had contractual relations with the Government since April 6, 1917, or who have been engaged in the large-scale production or distribution of food products, with the information hereinbefore requested regarding the profits derived by them from such contracts or in said production or distribution."

Mr. WALSH of Mssachusetts. I request that the resolution be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

AMERICAN BOLSHEVISM.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD two brief editorials on the spread of American Bolshevism in the United States.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOLSHEVISM HERE.

WASHINGTON, August —.

The Republican Publicity Association, through its president, Hon. Jonathan Bourne, jr., to-day gave out the following statement from its Washington headquarters:

"Bolshevism has at last reared its hydra heads in the United States in an organized and declared purpose to subvert government, expropriate private property, and seize economic control of the Nation. Bolshevism has stalked into the open, financed and accoutered for a war on republican institutions, and flying under its red flag the blue banner of the President of the United States, which it wrested from weakling hands in September, 1916. Bolshevism selects for its shock troops the four brotherhoods of railroad employees. Euphemize it as they may, the demands, the attitude, the plan of campaign, the purposes, the means, the ends, the revolution threatened by the leaders of these four brotherhoods are each and all identical with the program laid down by the Bolsheviki of Russia for the overthrow of orderly government and a final resort to anarchy. The 'Text of labor's demand to operate the railroads of the United States' might well have been formulated by a Lenin or a Trotski, and the language of the text exhibits a surprising familiarity with the Bolshevik creed. B. M. Jewell, one of the signers of the brotherhoods' ultimatum, is reported in an interview to have 'made it plain that the railroad workers mean business. He said that the wage-board program proposed in Congress could not be accepted,' and he boasted that 'the railroads will be tied up so tight they will never run again if that legislation is passed.' This is an open defy to the Government of the United States that unless the insolent demands of the brotherhoods are accepted as laid down there will speedily follow an economic revolution which can not but end in riot and bloodshed and famine in congested centers of population. Such is the fruit of the surrender of 1916.

"Through what instrumentality are the American people to function in accepting the challenge of the railroad brotherhoods? The administration has long been permeated with socialism and internationalism. In its perverted scheme of things nationalism is renounced and individualism is marked for destruction. Democracy is anathema, and free government is passing into oblivion. Since its accession to power March 4, 1913, the administration has consistently and indefatigably worked to array brother against brother, class against class, section against section, to the end, apparently, that out of the perplexities and confusion thus fomented all parties would turn to him who was the author of their distress as the persecuted children of Israel turned unto Moses. And this man would lead them not out of the land of bondage, but into the world of foreign entanglements and the straight jacket of a Nation gone mad.

"In the words of Marshal Joffre, 'The retreat must end. We must go forward.' The administration no longer yields to the forces of Bolshevism. It has become identified with that movement. Congress alone can turn the tide of battle for the restoration of a Government republican in form, of, by, and for the whole people. If the demands of the railroad brotherhoods are granted, then it follows as the night the day that the demands of some leaders of organized labor for the nationalization of every private industry will be affixed to the panel of every legislative door with a poniard.

"But whatever action the Chief Executive may take, be it inspired by the expediency of the hour, a belated attempt to redeem himself, or a wholesale abdication in favor of and to encourage Bolshevism, the Republican Congress will stand like Belgium against the Hun in this first onslaught against free government in America. It is this Republican rampart behind which the American people must mobilize their entire force to rid the land of socialism and internationalism in 1921. If we fail in that, government by law is at an end, and the European prophecy that the United States as a Republic can not long survive will have been fulfilled in something like a century and a half. Americans, rally to your Congress!"

REAP THE WHIRLWIND.

WASHINGTON, August 2.

The Republican Publicity Association, through its president, Hon. Jonathan Bourne, jr., to-day gave out the following statement from its Washington headquarters:

"Having sown to the winds, through the class favoritism, partisanship, and socialism of the President, it seems that the American people are now about to reap the whirlwind. On the eve of the election in 1916 a portion of the organized employees of the railroads demanded an increase in compensation under threat of tying up the transportation systems of the country in the midst of a critical period in our history. President Wilson surrendered under such circumstances and invited a similar movement on the eve of the election of 1920. By numerous acts he has catered to the Bolshevik element in our population, notably in his intercession in behalf of the Utah murderer, Holstrom, and the California convict, Mooney, both cases within State and beyond Federal jurisdiction. Partisanship he pursued to the extent of avoiding Republican assistance until national extremity forced its acceptance. Socialists have found favor in appointments and their theories have been placed in practice whenever opportunity would permit.

"The right of labor to organize and the right of labor to bargain collectively no one will deny, but there is a vast and vital difference between collective bargaining and collective dictation. The manner in which the four railroad brotherhoods demanded an increase of wages in 1916 was not collective bargaining. There were no two sides to the discussion. There was not even allowed time for discussion. The Nation was threatened with disaster of inconceivable extent unless the demands were met within a specified time, and the President's single-track mind, forsaken by the boasted 'fighting blood,' yielded the dignity of the Nation to the demonstration of power—surrendered the rights of all to the demands of a few.

"Unfortunately time and circumstances did not permit a popular expression upon the President's policy of surrender to the organized few in 1916. Unfortunately there is in effect no practical form of national referendum under which the people of the Nation could express their views upon such vital questions as surrender of national sovereignty to the league of nations and surrender of national dignity to the demands of organized labor under threats of national disaster.

"But it is to be hoped in the elections of 1920 a means will be found of securing a popular expression. This can be done if a sufficient number of candidates for Congress will make the surrender policy the paramount issue in their campaigns. The Democrats must, of course, stand by the record they have made. If Republicans in the primaries and the general elections will denounce that policy and stand for orderly procedure, with due consideration of the rights of the unorganized producer as well as the organized transportation employee—the rights of the shipper as well as the carrier—then we shall have an issue upon which the people of the country may express themselves in unmistakable tones.

"If we are to have dictatorship by the heads of the four brotherhoods, if we must submit to each new demand when it is made and adjust all other business to the wishes of the one class, then the sooner we know it the better. Until such determination shall be reached, the country waits with anxious interest each new move made by the President and the only power to which he bends the knee."

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I give notice that on Monday next at the close of the routine morning business I shall submit some remarks upon the league of nations.

AMERICA'S PARTICIPATION IN THE WAR.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I give notice that on Tuesday next, after the morning business has been concluded, I shall submit a few remarks on our participation in the war and the conduct of it.

METEOROLOGICAL CONFERENCE AT PARIS (H. DOC. NO. 197).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of the provision contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that "hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international Congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law to do so," I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the acceptance of the invitation and the appropriation necessary to defray the expenses incident thereto, a report from the Secretary of State with accompanying papers, being an invitation from the Government of the French Republic to that of the United States to send delegates to a proposed conference to be held at Paris on September 30, 1919, to consider questions relating to the reorganization of the service of the exchange of meteorological information, and for other purposes, and a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture showing the favor with which he views the proposed gathering and recommending an appropriation of $1,500 to defray the expenses of participation by at least two delegates.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
21 August, 1919.

AFFAIRS IN COSTA RICA (S. DOC. NO. 71).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, on motion of Mr. LA FOLLETTE, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

In response to the resolution of the Senate of the 2d instant, requesting that the President inform the Senate whether Nicaragua has been and is now permitted, with armed forces, to invade and to threaten with invasion the territory of Costa Rica, or has permitted armed bands to organize or rendezvous within her territory for such purposes; and for what reason Costa Rica, a belligerent with the Allies in the war just ended, was not permitted to sign the treaty of peace at Versailles, I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State, answering the inquiries contained in the resolution.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
21 August, 1919.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2775, known as the leasing bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. FERNALD obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Harris	McNary	Smith, Md.
Borah	Harrison	Moses	Smoot
Brandegee	Henderson	Nelson	Spencer
Calder	Hitchcock	New	Sterling
Capper	Johnson, Calif.	Norris	Sutherland
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Swanson
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Thomas
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Page	Townsend
Curtis	Kellogg	Phelan	Trammell
Dial	Kendrick	Phipps	Wadsworth
Elkins	Kenyon	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Fall	King	Poindexter	Walsh, Mont.
Fernald	Kirby	Pomerene	Warren
France	Knox	Ransdell	Watson
Gay	Lenroot	Reed	Wolcott
Gronna	Lodge	Robinson
Hale	McCumber	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF INDUSTRIES.

Mr. FERNALD. Mr. President, that my remarks may not seem to be disconnected, I hope that I may be able to conclude them without interruption.

Mr. President, problems of such stupendous importance are pressing for consideration and solution by this Congress—matters of such vital interest to our people and to the perpetuity of our Republic—that I deem it proper and imperative that each Member of the Senate contribute to the discussion of these questions all the light and knowledge he may possess.

The world seems to be in a state of hysteria. And unless the United States is to be drawn into the vortex, it is essential that this Senate refrain from hasty or impulsive action, and that it deliberate calmly and carefully on the issues of the hour. For weeks we have been discussing the league of nations and the treaty of peace with Germany—mighty problems, fraught with great responsibility, which may affect the peace, happiness, and safety of the Nation. It is not to this question, however, that I address myself, but rather to matters of a domestic nature, which I believe to be of far greater importance and of more vital interest to our citizens at this time.

Whatever the cause, we all must, and do, agree that the cost of living has mounted to an almost unprecedented height. People from every section and from every walk and station of life are clamoring for higher wages to keep body and soul together. Wages have been increased time and time again to a degree and standard higher than ever before known. And yet the cost of living keeps abreast and often a little ahead of the wage increase, so that no relief is given.

In this trying period of transition from a war to a peace basis the minds of men are full of uneasiness and distress. And in this mood of dissatisfaction they are ready to listen to any arguments or suggestions for relief, and are willing to accept theories and remedies that under normal conditions they would vigorously ignore and reject. I wish it were in my power to solve this great problem, so troublesome to the American people and the American Congress at this time. But it is beyond the conception of man to change these conditions in a moment or to visualize just what can be done by this Congress to bring relief. People are prone to forget that we have just passed through the greatest war in history; that we have taken 2,000,000 men for nearly two years from the farm, the factory, and desk and made them consumers in a large way instead of producers; that we have been destroying property of all kinds instead of preserving it; and that we have been using all the food material in this country not only for our own people but in attempting to supply the Allies and the peoples of the other nations of the world. And in returning to a normal peace basis naturally the country is in a state of great industrial upheaval.

Always, criticisms are first aimed at the Government and its officials. From many sources we hear unjust and unfair remarks about the administration, both military and civil, during the period of the war. It is not my intention to join this army of critics, because we have the great satisfaction of knowing that whatever may have been done, whatever the errors that have been made, we have been the one Nation of the earth to do more than any other in bringing the World War to a successful conclusion. That success is sufficient warrant for the outlay and sacrifice.

After faultfinding with the Government and its officials we are apt to take the greatest industry of the country and find fault with that. So there was stirred up in this country the feeling that the railroad owners were going to take charge of the country. And this aroused the belief that the railroads should be taken over by the Government and come under the Government control. This feeling became universal, so much so that the Government was given control, with most disastrous results. Now, I do not wish it understood that I am criticizing the Director General of the Railroads. I assume that the Secretary of the Treasury and those in control of the railroads did as well as could be done by any Government officials. But it is a shining example of the inefficiency that attends anything controlled or operated by the Government. And now there is a loud demand by the people of the country that the railroads be returned to private management. And this I assume will be done at the most opportune time.

After the railroads, critics began their attack on other large industries. And now it seems very popular to complain against the packing industry—or the packers, to be more explicit—because it has grown to be an industry of gigantic size. It is not my desire to defend the packers of this country except so far as I deem them in the right. I realize that it is perhaps somewhat unpopular to stand here in the defense of any large business of this country, because we are told that profiteering is going on to such an extent that men in all lines of business should be taken from their usual vocation and dragged into court, there to be sentenced for unlawful profiteering. I wish it to be understood at the start that wherever there is any unjust or unlawful transaction I desire every man sentenced to the extent of the law. I shield no man, nor attempt to, who is hoarding or who is juggling the business affairs of this country. But any man who is carrying on a lawful business—I care not how large nor whether it is big or little—I stand ready to defend. It matters little to me whether that man is a millionaire or a peanut vender; if he is in the right, I am his friend, and ready to stand by him.

In this spirit, knowing something, as I do, about the packing business of this country, I propose to lay before this Senate some facts which, perhaps, have not before been made public; to open the book and tell the story, so far as I know it, of the development of the meat-packing industry.

On June 23 the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] introduced a bill "to stimulate the production, sale, and distribution of live stock and live-stock products, and for other purposes." On the same date the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] introduced a bill with the same title. These bills applied to the Government control of the meat-packing business and the packers, and I assume were designed to control the business for the so-called "Big Five." I do not know why these 5 should be singled out any more than the 10 large packers, because there are many packing concerns, of course not so large as the 5 first mentioned, but in reality there are nearly 100 which could be mentioned among the large business concerns of the country.

A little later the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] introduced an amendment to the Kenyon bill, making the proposed license system apply to any business. And this amendment is quite consistent and in line with the proposed legislation in the other bills. Certainly if one line of industry is to be under Government control and subject to the dictates of the head of a department, all business should be treated alike. And we might go even further. We might undertake to control not only all of the business interests of the country, and every business man be told by some clerk of the Government what he should do, but surely some of the professional men should be under the same control, because certain professions are now so closely affiliated with the business interests of the country and the fees charged are so exorbitant, that it would seem to me that they, too, should be placed under the same restrictions.

However, I do not believe that this is to be the policy of this Government. I can not believe that the Senate of the United States feels, after the experience we have had with the Government control of the railroads and telegraph and telephone lines, that that policy should be continued. It would certainly lead to chaos and commercial bankruptcy.

I have referred to two bills—the so-called Kendrick and Kenyon bills. And before proceeding I wish to state that there is little difference between the two, except that the Kenyon bill covers a little broader field, and it increases the salary of the commissioner of foodstuffs from $6,000, as proposed in the Kendrick bill, to $10,000. Also, as I stated, the Moses amendment proposes a license for any and all business. I believe I have fairly stated the import of these bills. And while I shall discuss the measure in general I shall endeavor to confine my argument as closely as possible to the meat-packing industry.

I have been associated with the packing business for a third of a century. And while I do not profess to know the details of the meat-packing business, my own business—the packing of vegetables—is so similar that I realize the significance of the published statements of the large packers and the explanations they have given of their business before the congressional committees. I know that this vast industry which Congress has singled out for drastic legislation is no different from other large industries; and if the license is to be applied to them it should in all fairness be applied to every other business in the country.

I believe that the meat-packing industry as carried on by the great packers is the most efficient, economic method of turning live stock into meat and of getting meat into the hands of the consumers. A comparison of the present situation with the conditions that obtained 50 years ago gives some idea of the remarkable benefit that the modern method of meat handling has been to the country. I believe in discussing this particular branch of the packing business the people are entitled to know the truth and the whole truth, and that in bringing the matter to their attention it will clear up some very erroneous ideas that possibly may be in the minds of the Senators even at this time.

No business has experienced a greater evolution than that of the meat industry. Every man in this Chamber recalls the old days of meat slaughtering, when every butcher did his own work. There was no division of labor, only a few animals were handled at a time, and the conditions under which meat was dressed were not of the best. The meat was inferior in quality and the by-products were thrown away. Before the development of live-stock raising in the Middle West each community was supplied with animals raised within a short distance. And since cattle were raised more for milk than for beef, a large part of the beef supply under the local system was composed of dairy cattle, which furnished an inferior grade of meat. Corn feeding was pratically impossible before the agricultural development of the Middle West. But with the development of the great Mississippi Valley and the Western States and the raising of cattle and hogs in large numbers, they could be produced more economically than in the East because of cheap land covered with excellent grazing material, and, finally, of much better quality because of the development of corn culture. In those days live stock had to be shipped to eastern centers of consumption in stock cars of the railroads. This meant that freight on whole animals had to be paid; and in the case of cattle only a little over half of the animal was meat. This also resulted in deterioration of animals, shrinkage in weight, and deaths of large numbers in transit. It required many days in the sixties for a freight train to make the trip from the Middle West or West to the Eastern States. It also meant that those parts of animals which could not be used for food were thrown away, because of the inability to make use of by-products.

But the beginning of the modern packing industry took place in Chicago about a half century ago. Mr. G. H. Hammond, Mr. G. F. Swift, and Mr. P. D. Armour were among the first to realize the possibilities in the slaughtering of animals in or near the producing sections and the shipping of dressed meat to eastern markets. They were men of great vision, and wrought much better than they knew. They were men of insight, and foresaw the great possibilities for the packing industry. They realized that the great plains and ranches of the West would be the sections where the live stock would be produced, and that it would be more economical to establish the modern packing houses near these producing centers and ship the dressed meat to the large eastern sections rather than to ship the live animal. But there were great difficulties in the way; insurmountable obstacles confronted them. The modern refrigerator cars were unknown, and there was a prejudice among eastern people against western beef. The railroads had live-stock cars and refused to lend any assistance to aid the development of the refrigerator cars. They preferred to carry on business in the same old way, make no change, and refused to alter their cars to give to the industry the development which the first founders saw and predicted. So it was left to these men not only to perfect suitable cars for the carrying of meats, but they were compelled to actually build, own, and operate the cars. It is not realized, I am sure, how much perseverance and courage was necessary to overcome such difficulties. But as a result of that determination, genius, shrewdness, ability, and efficiency which is and has been characteristic of American business men we have to-day one of the greatest industries in the world—in fact, a business so large that it is the marvel of the nations of the earth.

From a small investment of a few dollars, with no equipment and insanitary methods, they now have hundreds of millions of capital invested, the most modernly equipped plants, where many thousands of people are employed, and where the meat and other products are handled in the most sanitary and scientific manner. This is another result of American initiative, American genius, and American thrift.

But the great development of this industry has brought with it tremendous responsibilities. The packer has his troubles, and his path has not been strewn with roses. And what I have to say of the meat industry applies to the packing of vegetables and every other product on the face of the earth. The packer to-day occupies an unenviable position between the producer, who wants his prices high, and the consumer, equally anxious to buy his products cheap. To serve and to satisfy both is in itself a problem.

One of the greatest achievements of the packing industry has been the utilization of by-products. It was several years after modern packing houses were established before it was learned by scientific investigation that the unused parts of the animal, which were at that time hauled away and discarded, could be used for various purposes. And it was not until the eighties that the utilization of by-products began, so that to-day there is very little waste. I do not know exactly how many by-products result from the packing of meat, but from some investigations which I have made there are more than 40 by-products from cattle, 25 from hogs, and about 20 from sheep. And there are scores of minor by-products which are used as raw material in making hundreds of articles by hundreds of industries.

A good description of the early development of by-products utilization is found in the testimony of J. Ogden Armour before the Senate Committee on Agriculture in February, 1919. His statement is as follows (p. 12):

> During the decade from 1880 to 1890 Armour & Co. continued to expand rapidly as new fields of endeavor opened up. It was during this period that the utilization of by-products began, and the development of that part of our business more than any other factor accounts for our being engaged in so many industries which at first glance seem unrelated to meat packing.
> In 1880 the firm found a satisfactory outlet for beef suet by beginning the manufacture of oleomargarine. Two years later methods were found for using blood, bones, and meat scrap. In 1884 the firm engaged in the glue business, so as to have an outlet for great quantities of animal material that in the past had been wasted. The following year the firm was able to put a high-grade pepsin and a beef extract on the market, and in the years that followed ways and means were found to utilize everything in or on a meat animal.
> I assume that you know the economic aspects of this by-product development, how it has enabled the producer to get more for his meat animal and the consumer to pay less, proportionately, for his meat. The big packers are to be credited with this development, for without their quantity production the by-products industry could not have been developed. For example, 5,000 steers must be killed before we can produce 1 pound of posterior pituitary substance, from which is made pituitary liquid, a drug valuable to prevent shock after a wound is sustained. Needless to say, small packers could not produce many pounds of pituitary liquid, because by the time they have killed any considerable number of animals the pituitary glands from the first animals killed have ceased to be usable.

Permit me to say here that this drug was used to great advantage by the medical fraternity in the World War, and probably saved thousands of lives. And it could have been produced in no other way except by these packers slaughtering such enormous quantities of cattle that they were able to manufacture this valuable liquid.

Referring again to Mr. Armour's statement, he says:

> From 1890 to 1900 the firm continued growing and expanding. We entered into the manufacture of dry sausage largely for export in order to better utilize coarser cuts of meat, which while perfectly good and wholesome in every way did not lend themselves to sale to best advantage on the market. We went into the fertilizer business primarily to utilize the great quantity of packing-house waste. A similar reason caused us to enter into soap-making industry. Both of these latter businesses have long since ceased to depend upon packing-house waste for raw material, but for all that we regard them as important phases of our business.

One of the most notable results of by-product utilization in the case of cattle, for example, is the fact that all the meat from a steer can be sold by the packer for much less than he pays for the live animal. According to the statement of Swift & Co. for 1919—and they are among the largest packers in the country—they paid an average of $92.70 per head for cattle in the year 1918, but sold the meat for $81 per head. In addition to this $22.06 was received for by-products—total receipts $103.51 per head, as compared with $92.70, the amount paid for the live animal. This left $10.81 for expense and profit, and the statement shows that only $1.02 per head for profit was allowed. I understand that that is equal to about ¼ cent per pound. That seems an unbelievably small sum to charge as profit. I understand that it has been claimed that the packers do not correctly credit the by-products to their beef business; but it seems to me that even if their profit were several times that much, it would be a very small item in the family meat bill.

The by-product business alone has become one of great proportions in this country. Many edible foods are manufactured, and this means that meats can be sold at lower prices as compared to the cost of live animals than would otherwise be possible. It means more than this; it means development of new industries, the employment for more labor, and the satisfying of more wants. To my way of thinking the discovery made by packers that by-products that were thrown away could be utilized for splendid food is one of the greatest achievements of modern times. But these by-products can not be utilized effectively unless the packing industry is organized on a large scale, or when it is concentrated in large markets. If it were not for the big volume of business done the packer could not sell the meat as cheaply as he does to-day; because volume permits him to utilize all by-products, and the packer makes his profit on these by-products alone and not out of the dressed meat. The small packer, especially if he is in the country districts, is at a disadvantage in this respect, as he can not utilize to the same extent the by-products as the big packer can, because he does not have sufficient volume of business to justify it. But the small packer in a large city does not suffer to such disadvantage as he formerly did, for there is a fairly good market for by-products that he himself can not utilize.

In the development and growth of this business no one appreciates more than I the advantage of producing in a large way, because I have had the experience. I started in the packing business in a very small way, with one small factory producing but a few thousand cans per day, and by economy, hard work, and patience my business has grown to the operation and management of eight canneries, handling the products of many towns, and with little extra expense in office work or what might be termed overhead charges.

And while I am discussing this phase of the subject, Mr. President, I want to consider the large packing business. Some complain that the companies are too large. I understand that the author of one of the bills, Senator KENDRICK, bases his argument for Government regulation on the fact that they are national and international in scope and therefore ought to be curbed by the Government. I think the most important fact of this matter is that the packing business has to be conducted by large establishments. As I have already suggested, a very large part of the live stock is raised in the Middle West and a majority of the consumers are located in the East. This makes it necessary in this particular line to assemble the live stock for slaughter on a large scale near where the cattle are raised and for the packer to provide a distributing organization for getting the meat and by-products in the hands of distant consumers.

I have heard it said that the small packer can not provide a selling organization which will distribute fresh meat all over the country in carload lots. I do not see why a small packing business should be expected to maintain branch distributing houses in all cities of the country. It must take a large output to maintain a lot of branches. As a matter of fact, small packers are by their size limited very largely to a local business. Only large packers can take care of long-distance business that requires much organization and equipment. I do not see that it will be any benefit to try to boost small, poorly equipped firms into a large-scale way of doing business for which they are not fitted.

So that when this proposition is viewed in its proper light I think it will be found that the present organization of the packing industry really meets the needs of the situation in this country and results in efficiency. It also remains to be proved whether the large packers are not in active competition. I am inclined to believe their statement that they have no agreements, especially as there is no positive evidence to the contrary. I believe this because in my own State, where we pack a particular style of goods that can not be produced in any other section to compete with us, there have never been any gentleman's agreements nor combinations to control that business, and the packers in the State of Maine are in sharp competition with each other. I can not understand how the packers would dare to make these statements if they were not true. I can not understand how they would dare to have any agreements, even if they wanted to, in view of the constant investigations and surveillance of their industry. Common sense tells me that they would not be foolish enough to run the risk that would be involved in agreements.

The so-called Big Five packers, I am advised by the investigation I have made, handle less than 40 per cent of the total meat production of the country, and only about 70 per cent of the output of the inspected packing houses, which ship goods in interstate commerce. The largest packer handles only about 12 per cent of the total meat supply and only 22 per cent of the output of inspected houses. In 1918 there were 884 packing houses having Federal inspection outside of those owned by the five largest packers. This number does not include hundreds of packing houses doing an intrastate business which are not under Government inspection.

I understand that the smaller packers are fairly prosperous; that they are not only making money but steadily increasing their volume of business. Some of the so-called small packers are very large size, as, for example, Kingan, Dold, Hermel, and many others, who do a large interstate and foreign business.

Those who criticize the five largest packers on account of their size should remember that in many important industries there is one single corporation that handles a much larger percentage of the total output than is the case in the packing industry. For example, I refer to the United States Steel Co. (Inc.), the Standard Oil Co., the International Harvester Co., the Continental Wall Paper Co., the American Woolen Co., and so forth.

There are some who declare that the packing industry should be composed of small units instead of large. The small packer is not in a position to render the same service that the large packers do. The large packers undertake the expense not only of slaughtering and dressing animals but they pay freight on goods to all parts of the country, operate branch houses, have their own salesmen, accountants, expert meat cutters and handlers, and so forth, and even deliver considerable into the hands of retailers with their delivery trucks.

Instead of restraining packers and undertaking to tell them what they should do, in my judgment, they should have more liberty; and if they were permitted to divide territory, it would save a great expense which is now incurred. For instance, in small cities of thirty or forty thousand inhabitants we find from 5 to 10 packing houses who have warehouses, offices, clerks, bookkeepers, managers, handlers of beef, stock drivers, and so forth, that could all be readily handled by one concern; and 5 or 6 men could easily do the business that is carried on by 30 or 40. This, of course, can not be done, because it would be said that they were in restraint of trade, and so they are obliged to keep this large force of employees to satisfy the law. Possibly this is best. In fact, probably it is best; because combinations might be made that would be detrimental to the interest of the consumer. But from the standpoint of economy great expense could be saved; and if this expense could be used for the benefit of the consumer, millions of dollars might be turned his way.

The small packer has to pay relatively little for freight and selling expense, because he sells his goods locally or buys through a wholesale dealer in a distant market. In other words, large packers perform a much more extensive service and a very necessary one, and consequently you can not safely compare their expense with the expense of the smaller packer who performs a lesser service.

I feel that there is room, and a great need, for both the small and large packer. From testimony given before the House and Senate committees last winter the small packers are not complaining; for at those hearings they said that they had been prosperous; that they had not suffered from the competition of the large packers; and that they were opposed to legislation regulating the packing industry. And I want to say that I have received letters from very many of the smaller packers of my State opposing these bills. Even the Federal Trade Commission in its report on profiteering made the following statement with regard to the small packers:

> The independent packers, as measured by results compiled for 65 of the largest of them, earned during 1914, 1915, and 1916 a rate of profit as high or slightly higher than that earned by the big packers in those years.

One of the best illustrations that I know of, which demonstrates the efficiency of large business units, is the splendid service the packers rendered during the war. They did a big job, and they did it in a big way. I doubt, Mr. President, if many realize what a vital part the packers played during the war in keeping the Allies and our own countrymen fed, which was one of the necessary services in winning that contest.

I believe the records will show that there is no industry in the country that performed a greater service. They had such a perfect machinery, organized on a national and an international basis, that they were able to take care of war demands perhaps more promptly and efficiently than any other industry in the country. Their efficiency in this respect alone is one of the best arguments that can be found for the present organization of the packing industry on a large scale.

The following export figures in round numbers give some idea of the tremendous quantity of beef and pork products sent abroad as a result of the war:

Beef products.	Pounds.
In 1914	148,000,000
In 1918	590,000,000
Pork products.	Pounds.
In 1914	921,000,000
In 1918	1,600,000,000

In this connection I want to speak a word with reference to the National Canners' Association, which was called upon and used in a great many capacities by the different Government offices. Because of the fact that perishable food could not be taken to foreign cantonments in any other manner than in tin cans or cold storage, it can readily be seen that the canning industry had to put forth its utmost efforts throughout the war to meet the Government requirements. This is evidenced in the report of Mr. Benedict Crowell, Assistant Secretary of War and Director of Munitions, in which he says:

> We literally paved the way to Berlin with tin cans. We used more than 1,000,000,000 cans. Enough, standing on end, to make a road wide enough and long enough for a force of men marching in columns of four to go from Hoboken, N. J., to the heart of Germany.

Yet these men who produced this quantity of canned food have been declared in this Senate a menace to the country. As between them and their accusers I shall leave you to judge.

Early in 1918 representatives of the Army and Navy attended the annual convention of the National Canners' Association, which was held in Boston, and urged maximum production of canned foods in every possible way. The industry was strained to its utmost. And owing to the officially established price of wheat, which automatically established in the minds of farmers a minimum expectation of acreage return, it was forced to pay the farmers a largely increased price for all of its raw products.

The Army and Navy, fearing that the price to be paid farmers for raw tomatoes could not be controlled, issued a bulletin February 28, 1918, through the Food Administration, stating that they would be unwarranted in making any award for canned tomatoes, or tomato products, based on raw material prices in excess of certain amounts.

This bulletin brought forth earnest protests from farmers, and the matter was taken up by the United States Senate, with the result that the bulletin was withdrawn.

In 1918 the requirements for the Army and Navy were placed through the Food Administration direct with individual canners. The authority for the Food Administration placing these commandeered orders was through the direction of the Food Purchase Board. The individual canners were required to readjust their plans from time to time as the needs of the Government became apparent.

In April, 1918, the canners were instructed to hold for the Government 15 per cent of their season's production of peas, corn, and tomatoes. On July 30 these percentages were increased to 25 per cent of the peas and corn and 33⅓ per cent of the tomatoes. On September 27 the new percentage of tomatoes was increased to 45 per cent. The original commandeer of string beans was 25 per cent, and this was later increased to 40 per cent of the entire pack.

One of the Big Five packers alone shipped 760,000,000 pounds of meat and meat products during the year ending November 1, 1918, to the American Army and Navy at home and abroad and to allied nations and their armies and civilians. This amounts to 25,000 carloads of meat, which would make a single train 200 miles long. This same company shipped as many as 1,000 cars for Army at home and for overseas shipment in a single week.

What might have happened to ourselves and to our allies during the war had it not been for this wonderfully well organized and efficient industry? What if the Big Five had been divided into three, four, or five thousand units? Does anyone believe they would have had the organization and equipment to have rendered such service? It is difficult to imagine how many millions of troops in Europe could have been adequately fed without the organization of the packers. We know that in many wars in the past armies supplied themselves by foraging in the country through which they were passing. But during the European war millions of men had to be supplied with meat from points thousands of miles away. This was all done quickly and efficiently, and there were no complaints as to the wholesomeness, the cleanliness of the food, or of the service rendered, and not a single death has been reported from this source. If there had not been an efficient machinery in operation at the beginning of the war, the accomplishments in this direction would never have been possible.

I want to dwell at some length on the subject of the profits made by packers, because I think that that is one of the controlling facts of this industry that you have to consider in connection with the proposed legislation.

The history of the agitation which has culminated in these bills is that the live-stock producer has complained from time to time that his economic condition has been injuriously affected by fluctuations in prices of live stock, resulting in severe losses. It has been repeatedly, in fact continually, charged that the losses which the live-stock raiser has at times suffered have been due to extortionate profits taken by the large packers. It is the hope of those back of the proposed legislation that Government control will so regulate the profits of the packers that these losses in the raising of live stock will be avoided.

It therefore appears that there is expected from this legislation a reduction in the difference between the price of the live animal and the price of meat and by-products; so that the live-stock raiser will be enabled to get more for his live stock, and the consumer to get his meat at a lower price.

I believe that it has been generally conceded that the packers handle their business in an efficient manner, and with a proper economy of expense.

Our experience with Government control of railroads and telephones certainly gives no hope that under Government regulation the expense of conducting the business would be reduced. The only hope, therefore, is that there can be a substantial improvement made in the economic status of the producer and consumer through a reduction in the profit made by the packers. That is in the minds of those who are urging this legislation as being the cure to be applied to the situation. The Federal Trade Commission has laid great emphasis on what they call extortionate profits taken by the packers and, in my opinion, have gone to great lengths to mislead the country as to the real situation, with the result that after more than two years of investigation the general public is yet without reliable information presented so as to disclose the effect of the packers' profits on the producer and consumer. The general public have been misled by the quotation of large figures of total profits into the belief that the packers have made extortionate profits and have, in fact, seriously affected prices of live animals and meat by reason of excessive profits.

There is, however, no lack of evidence to show that that is not true and that the real facts show profits so small as not to affect prices appreciably. For one year ending November 2, 1918, the packers were under the supervision of the Food Administration, their profits during this time being covered by certain profit restrictions. Their books and records were also under the close supervision of the Federal Trade Commission, who had a force of men located in Chicago in daily touch with the books and records of the packers, which books and records were subject to their inspection.

The Food Administration has made an annual report as to the operations of the five large packers during this year, from which I quote the following figures:

Total profit	$40,594,935
Investment	$714,187,204
Profit percentage on investment	5.6
Sales	$2,434,113,430
Profit percentage on sales	1.6

Is there any other business of like size and like investment in this country that shows so small a percentage of profits allowed on the investment or on sales as does the five large meat packers of the country? These figures cover the operations in the slaughtering of live animals and the distribution of meat and by-products therefrom, and, under the Food Administration rules, include all profits that legitimately belong to the meat industry.

I want particularly to call your attention to the fact that the profit on the investment was only 5.6 per cent and on the sales 1.6 per cent; that is to say, 1.6 cents profit on each dollar of sales.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. FERNALD. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I think for the sake of accuracy or clarity it ought to be stated that this profit realized by the packers of 5.6 per cent is not the profit upon the capital of the packing companies, but represents a profit upon every dollar invested or employed in the business. That is to say, if a packing company has a capital of $10,000,000, and then borrows $100.000,000, the profit represents 5.6 per cent on all the money thus employed. So the packer first pays the interest on his borrowed money and charges that as expense. That capital has once borne an interest burden. Then upon the money he thus borrows he makes a net return of 5.6 per cent. So money which he borrowed at 6 per cent has to bear the ultimate burden of 11.6 per cent.

I am not saying for the present that that may not be proper, but I would not want it to appear that a packing company had made only 5.6 per cent upon the capital stock of the company.

Mr. FERNALD. I thank the Senator for his observation.

Mr. GRONNA. Will it disturb the Senator to be further interrupted?

Mr. FERNALD. No; I yield gladly to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I think it is generally understood by everyone who has investigated this matter that under the regulations made by the Government the packers were allowed to make a profit of 2½ per cent on their turnover, and that they made a profit as stated by the Senator from Maine. Is that correct?

Mr. FERNALD. I think that is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. It is also true that they did not make the 2½ per cent allowed by the Government.

Mr. FERNALD. No; they did not.

Mr. REED. That is to say, the Government regulation was so high that the packer could not reach it.

Mr. FERNALD. I will come to that later.

Mr. REED. So Government regulation does not seem to promise much in that respect.

Mr. FERNALD. In 1918 the packers were under a great many restrictions imposed by the Food Administration, and it might therefore be claimed that the profit resulting from operations in that year did not reflect the normal conditions of the industry.

I have had prepared a statement which I would like to introduce covering the sales and profits of the four large packers—Wilson & Co. figures not being available—for the last 10 years.

I want particularly to call your attention to the fact that for the first five-year period their sales were $4,070,000,000, the profits $79,000,000, or 1.94 cents per dollar of sales. For the second five-year period—the war period—their sales were $8,399,000,000; profits, in round numbers, $204,000,000, or 2.44 cents per dollar of sales. The lowest rate per dollar sales was 1.34 cents, the highest 3.36 cents. It is true that the total amount of the packers' profits has increased from $79,000,000 for the first five-year period to $204,000,000, but their volume of business has more than doubled.

I have to confess that I can not see how the packers can have injuriously affected the economic status of producer and consumer by taking such extremely small profits.

I doubt if there is any large industry in the country which does business on such a narrow margin of profit. To me these facts absolutely show that packers' profits have little effect in keeping meat prices high or in keeping live-stock prices low. The difference paid these two would seem to me to be as low as is possible. Only large volume of business makes it possible to operate on such a small margin of profit.

We all realize that the price of all commodities at present is higher than ever before experienced. I can not find that meat prices are in proportion any higher than the prices of other commodities. It would be interesting to consider how the economic status of the producers of live stock is to be benefited by the proposed legislation. It has been shown by some of the packers—Swift, I think, more particularly—that 85 cents out of each dollar of sales is paid for the live animal; 13 cents for labor, freight, and other expenses, and only 2 cents was profit. You will note that 13 cents went for freight, labor, and other expenses. It is undoubtedly true that the packer is paying regular rates for transportation of his meats. A reduction of these rates is a matter that can not be affected by the proposed legislation. The packers' expenditures for labor and other expenses can be reduced only by greater efficiency.

Keeping in mind our experience with railroads and telephones, I think you will have very grave doubts as to any saving being made out of the packer's expenditures for labor and other expenses by this legislation. This leaves only 2 cents, which the packer retains as his profit. This 2 cents is less than one-half cent per pound, and amounts to about 90 cents per capita, based on the average consumption of 182 pounds of meat per capita of production per annum.

I do not believe that the consumers of this country or the producers want to try the radical experiment of governmental control of industries if that is all the saving that can possibly be made. If you can not reduce materially the packer's expenses or his profits, then the only way you can get lower-priced meats is to pay the producer less for his live stock.

At this point I want to show the other side—that the economic condition of the producer and consumer has been tremendously helped by the initiative, energy, and efficiency of the packers in keeping abreast of an expanding industry by preparing the products of live stock with the highest degree of skill and energetically finding a market for them throughout the world and in this country, so that in every village and town, and even in country districts, it is possible for the consumer to secure full supplies and wide varieties of all kinds of meat products, delivered to him in the very best of condition.

This widespread market for products has made possible the present vast size of the live-stock industry. There is no country in the world that has such an efficient and energetic instrumentality in getting live-stock products to market as the packers have furnished the live-stock raisers of this country.

I think, Mr. President, that the principal reason for this legislation and the agitation that is going on in some quarters against the packers is due in some respect to an investigation conducted by the Federal Trade Commission, and I want to go into that question for a little while.

The investigation of the packing industry was started by the Federal Trade Commission in the summer of 1917. It was started on instructions from President Wilson:

> To investigate and report the facts relating to production, ownership, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foodstuffs, and the product or by-products arising from or in connection with their preparation and manufacture.

The letter from the President containing these instructions was dated February 7, 1917. But what has the Federal Trade Commission done since the President gave these instructions nearly two and one-half years ago? The fact is, the commission has investigated meat industries only, and only that part with which the packers are concerned. No attempt has been made to investigate live-stock prices or the cost of live-stock production, and no study has been made, so far as I know, of retail distribution.

When the investigation began it bid fair to be an impartial one. But all of the packers declare that it soon developed that the Trade Commission was seeking only such information as it could use, by distorting facts and by adroit interpretation, to make out a case against the packing industry. The investigation was a one-sided affair. It was an ex parte proceeding. To start with, the commission employed an attorney who was at that time a candidate for office, and who sought throughout his employment with the commission to gain all the publicity and notoriety possible. He had gained his reputation as a prosecuting attorney and he began to perform in that capacity for the commission.

The packers insist that prejudiced witnesses were sought out to testify against them. They were not permitted, however, through legal counsel, to cross-examine these witnesses. They could not produce witnesses who, through cross-examination, would controvert the evidence of prejudiced witnesses, nor were they permitted to cross-examine witnesses of their own, to substantiate the facts which they might have produced. It is true that representatives of the packers might have appeared at these hearings, but since they would have been subject to cross-examination by a hostile attorney, and since they had no right of cross-examining witnesses themselves, or through counsel, they naturally did not care to submit to any unjust procedure.

In further support of my contention that these hearings were unfair, I call your attention to the significant fact that Mr. Colver, of the Federal Trade Commission, admitted to the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, December 19, 1918, that the hearings had been ex parte in character.

The packers further assert that other questionable methods of procedure were used by the commission, when their agents went through the private files of the packers and selected only such parts of correspondence as might appear to make a case against the packers. They say a letter here and a letter there, scraps of paper, were taken from the files while the hearings were being held, and these read into the record, not only without adequate explanation but with misleading insinuation and wrong interpretation. All of these were given at once to the newspapers, which resulted in sensational items being printed which inflamed the public, and is responsible more than anything else for the prejudice in the minds of the people against the packing industry.

This report of the Federal Trade Commission, as far as I have been able to investigate it, contains no evidence of monopoly. I am reliably informed, Mr. President, that the commission in some instances actually used only such parts of telegrams taken from the files of the packers as appeared to bear out its case, omitting items from the same telegrams which were not useful evidence to the commission.

So here we have an agency of the Government, constituting itself mainly as a prosecuting body, losing sight very largely of its function in the aid and guidance of business. The Federal Trade Commission, in place of cooperating and being of some assistance, has, and is now, badgering, harrying, and heckling American business interests.

Mr. President, instead of interfering with the business affairs of the country every Senator on this floor ought to be trying to encourage business, and in those splendid States of the South there ought to be erected this year more than 100 canneries to take care of their products. Instead of that, however, no development is being made along these lines.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to some statements contained in the summary of the report of the Federal Trade Commission, wherein monopoly and collusion is charged. These statements are made in a letter to President Wilson, written by W. B. Colver, then chairman of the commission. The report is dated July 3, 1918. Here are some of the statements Mr. Colver makes:

> First. It appears that five great packing concerns of the country—Swift, Armour, Morris, Cudahy, and Wilson—have attained such a dominant position that they control at will "the market in which they buy their supplies, the market in which they sell their products, and hold the fortune of their competitors in their hands."

A little further on in this letter Mr. Colver further states:

> Some independent packers exist by sufferance of the five, and a few hardy ones have survived in real competition. Around such few of these as remain the lines are drawing in.

On last Monday, August 18—and I am glad the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is present—Mr. Colver went before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and practically reiterated the charge to the committee contained in his letter to the President. He declared:

> We have found that there are five great meat-packing corporations in this country, which, independently and collectively, control the meat-packing industry of the country. There are many independents, some of considerable size, many smaller ones. We find that these independents, in so far as they do exist, exist at sufferance, and as you become more familiar with these reports I think that that will be as clear to you as it seems to be clear to us.

But now let us see, Mr. President, whether that is the truth or not. Only yesterday a number of independent packers appeared before the Senate Committee on Agriculture, and these men's testimony discredits absolutely the report of the Federal Trade Commission as well as the statement made by Mr. Colver no longer ago than last Monday. There were eight or nine prosperous and independent packers who appeared before the Senate committee yesterday protesting against the enactment of the Kendrick and Kenyon bills. Their resolutions, or letter, to the chairman of the committee is as follows:

> The undersigned, being beef and pork packers in the city of Baltimore, hereby strongly oppose the two bills known as the Kendrick bill, No. 2202, and the Kenyon bill, No. 2199, introduced in the Senate of the United States on June 23, 1919, for the following reasons:
> First. Because the bill states "it is to stimulate the production as well as the distribution of live stock, live-stock products, and for other purposes," which, in our opinion, it can not possibly do.
> Second. Because we are opposed to placing the live stock and live-stock products industry in the hands of any one person, being sure that no man living has the ability or capacity to discharge the duties of such a position fairly and without hardship to some packers. And our experience has been that power has been used arbitrarily on many occasions, and this would seriously hamper the proper conduct of the business.
> Third. We believe that there are sufficient laws upon the statute books to prevent meat packers from making any unreasonable profits.
> Fourth. It is not possible to hamper or reduce the efficiency of the meat packers without injuring the live-stock producers and limiting their output, which in turn decreases the amount of food products for the consumer and increases the price
> Fifth. Because it is a long step toward Government ownership, thereby taking away ambition and initiative.
> Sixth. If the packing industry is handicapped, it will be difficult, if not impossible, for the packer to secure sufficient loans at the banks throughout the country during the packing season, when the producer wants a ready market for all of his live stock.
> Finally, because of alleged misdoings of the large packers, hundreds of smaller packers who have labored for many years to build up their business this bill injures and tends to destroy.
> T. Davis Hill, of Cochran, Hill & Co.; Howard R. Smith, of Jones & Lamb Co.; Joseph Kurdle, of the Thos. J. Kurdle Co.; Fred Shafer, of Jacob C. Shafer Co.; Sol. Greenewald, of Greenewald & Co.; C. F. Kurrle, of Kurrle Packing Co.; W. F. Schluderberg, of the Wm. Schluderberg & Son Co.; C. F. Hohman, of C. Hohman & Sons; H. C. Bertram, of D. B. Martin Co.

Then a number of these gentlemen went on the witness stand and in their testimony declared that the so-called Big Five had not and were not trying to crush them—they had been treated fairly—and opposed this legislation. I wish to call your attention to the testimony of Mr. T. Davis Hill, of Cochran, Hill & Co. (Inc.), beef and pork packers, of Baltimore, Md. This company has just completed a new million-dollar plant and expanded its business. Until a few months ago they were in the pork-packing business, but with their new plant they are slaughtering cattle, sheep, and other animals. Reading from the record of yesterday, we find as follows:

> Senator WADSWORTH. Has your business—if you do not mind saying so—been growing the last 10 years?
> Mr. HILL. Yes.
> Senator WADSWORTH. Has it been subject to any undue interferences by any other corporation?
> Mr. HILL. Nothing except what competition brings.
> Senator WADSWORTH. And you are expanding?
> Mr. HILL. Yes, sir; very much so.

Mr. Hill further testified that his company went out into the open market and bought their live stock. He said they bought it at Louisville, Indianapolis, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and as far west of Kansas City. Along this line, Senator WADSWORTH asked Mr. Hill this question:

> Senator WADSWORTH. Have any of the men who have been buying for you made any complaint to your company that their operations as buyers were hampered in any way in the stockyards?
> Mr. HILL. Never; I have not any idea they are.

A little further we read from the record:

> Senator WADSWORTH. Has any question arisen in your experience that would lead you to believe the packers control the market?
> Mr. HILL. They can not do it.
> Senator WADSWORTH. You mean they can not do it?
> Mr. HILL. They can not do it.
> Senator WADSWORTH. Why not?
> Mr. HILL. There are too many small buyers.
> Senator WADSWORTH. Too many small buyers?
> Mr. HILL. Too many outside packers. You look into the Drover's Magazine and you will see that outside buyers purchase in Chicago some days more than all the large packers put together. In other words, there are so many orders coming into a market like Chicago some days, for instance, that the smaller packers frequently make the market for the big packers.

Senator WADSWORTH then asked Mr. Hill about his profits. This is also very interesting, Mr. President:

> Senator WADSWORTH. How does your margin of profit compare with that of your most powerful competitor, if you can make the comparison?
> Mr. HILL. According to their statements, ours was a little better last year. If you will remember, the Government limited the packing industry to 2½ per cent profit on the volume of business. I see by the statements of the large packers that they did not make it.
> Senator WADSWORTH. It ran about neck and neck—you did a little better than they did?
> Mr. HILL. I believe in 10 years we have done a little better than the larger packers.

So, Mr. President, that would not indicate that the independent packers are existing by sufferance. The testimony yesterday was very interesting, and I want to go a little further:

> Senator FRANCE. Mr. Hill, you have built up your business by buying in competition with big packers and in selling in competition with them in the markets?
> Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.
> Senator FRANCE. Can you cite any instance of unfair competition against you?
> Mr. HILL. None whatever. Their competition is just the same as we meet all over the country.
> Senator FRANCE. Have they never tried to undersell you for the purpose of driving you out of business?
> Mr. HILL. I have never seen that disposition. Their competition is exactly the same as we meet everywhere else. There are many branch houses in the business, as you know, and we are in constant competition with smaller and larger packers.
> Senator WADSWORTH. How many independent packers are there in Baltimore?
> Mr. HILL. Ten or twelve.
> Senator WADSWORTH. Ten or twelve small packers?
> Mr. HILL. Yes.

As a further evidence of there being competition, in reply to a question by Senator CAPPER, "Is not the market practically the same in respect to the independent packers and 'Big Five' packers; that is, you are not attempting to make a better price than the five big packers at any time?" Mr. Hill says:

> As I say, that is not our policy. Our policy is to go out and sell these goods at a profit when we can do it. I venture to say that there is 4 or 5 cents a pound difference between the highest and lowest price on hams in Baltimore to-day.

Mr. President, I understand these other packers from Baltimore testified practically the same things as Mr. Hill. Besides the Cochran, Hill & Co. expanding, Jones & Lamb, of Baltimore, have, I understand, awarded contracts for $1,000,000 worth of improvements; that D. B. Martin & Co., another independent packer of Baltimore, is spending $500,000 on improvements; and that William Schluderberg & Sons have awarded a contract for an addition to their plant costing $600,000.

Mr. President, does this look like "the lines are drawing in"? All of these gentlemen who testified yesterday, I understand, are among the leading citizens of Baltimore, men of character and standing in their community, and yet we have an agency of the Government giving out reports which are evidently untrue. In addition to the testimony of Mr. Hill, Mr. Howard R. Smith, president of the Jones & Lamb Co., Baltimore, in a statement said:

> The impression seems to be abroad with some people that large packers are just simply monopolizing everything and driving the smaller packer out of business. I want to say that we have been in the packing business for 15 years, and we have large and smaller packers as competitors. They have not put us out of business. We have grown right along; in fact, we are now erecting a new plant at Baltimore.

As I have said, Mr. President, this company is building a million-dollar plant.

Mr. Sol. Greenewald, president of the Greenewald Packing Co., Baltimore, when asked if the big packers interfered with them in any way in their business, said: "No, sir; not at all." Mr. Greenewald told the committee that they went into other markets in Kansas City and Chicago, went into competition in stockyards of these places, and bought their live stock. He also denied that the big packers controlled competition. He said the yards were open to anyone.

On July 11, 1919, in a summary, the Federal Trade Commission in its report said:

> The packers are also important factors in condensed milk, and are rapidly increasing their proportion. Wisconsin is covered by their creameries, condenseries, and buying stations, and a similar process and control is already evident in the other principal dairy States.

Now, let us see about that statement. Yesterday Mr. William T. Nardin, vice president of the Helvetia Milk Condensing Co., whom I know very well, appeared before the Agriculture Committee of the Senate, and when asked what percentage of the milk business was controlled by the packers, replied:

> There was last year produced in the United States about 33,000,000 cases condensed and evaporated milk. * * * The packers produced of that, I should say, not more than 3,000,000 cases.

This, you realize, is not 10 per cent of the milk business of the country.

Chairman GRONNA asked Mr. Nardin this question:

> The CHAIRMAN. How do you find them as competitors? It has been complained, of course, that they are unfair and that when they begin to operate in a new industry they will make prices lower to make it impossible for people with smaller capital to carry on the business and make a profit.
> Mr. NARDIN. Speaking for my own company, the company with which I am connected, we have found no difficulty in packer competition in the milk business.

So here we have the testimony of one of the leading milk manufacturers of the country saying the packers controlled less than 10 per cent of the milk business and that they are not unfair in competition.

I desire to call your attention, Mr. President, to another phase of the Federal Trade Commission's report. That is the retail business. Yesterday Mr. Emanuel Wasserman, of Louis Wasserman & Sons, retailers and jobbers of fresh and smoked meats, of Norfolk, Va., gave testimony before the Senate committee against the Kenyon bill. Here is a portion of his testimony. Mr. Wasserman said:

> My firm is 47 years old. We handled fresh meats before the packers came into Norfolk and since the packers came into Norfolk. And I want to say that I have personally had 26 years of experience, and all of the dealings I have ever had with the packers themselves they have been absolutely fair and square, and I have prospered since I have dealt with them.

Mr. Wasserman told the committee that before the packers went to Norfolk the butchers got their cattle the best way they could; that the meats were inferior in quality; but since the packers went to Norfolk he said that "meat was delivered to us in better condition; the quality was much better than we could get around home in the country."

Chairman GRONNA asked the witness this question:

> Your experience with the packers, then, leads you to believe that the packers are not taking undue advantage of their customers or of the public?
> Mr. WASSERMAN. I have had no trouble in any shape or form. I have always been able to buy from them. I have bought also from independent concerns, but I have usually been able to do better buying from the packers. There are two independent concerns in Baltimore that I deal with, and very often I can buy a great deal cheaper right at home from the packers, and save their freight charge, than I can from these independent people.

So, Mr. President, here we have testimony from the independent packers, who are prospering, expanding, defending the "Big Five" from charges made by the Federal Trade Commission, and who are against this bill.

I wish to say that I have some letters which I shall place in the RECORD, without reading, from many other small, independent packers of the country.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA, August 15, 1919.

Hon. BERT M. FERNALD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed please find printed copies of resolutions passed by the Sioux City Live Stock Exchange on August 8, opposing the Kenyon bill, which we feel is most detrimental not only to the farmer and producer but also to the entire live-stock industry.

We trust you will give these resolutions your careful consideration as the Live Stock Exchange is thoroughly familiar with all phases of the live-stock industry and speaks from actual knowledge.

Respectfully, yours,

PAUL H. CALDWELL,
Secretary Sioux City Live Stock Exchange.

OPPOSED TO THE KENYON BILL—SIOUX CITY LIVE STOCK EXCHANGE SETS FORTH REASONS FOR LACK OF FAITH IN PROPOSED LEGISLATION.

At a meeting of the Sioux City Live Stock Exchange, held yesterday afternoon, the following resolutions were adopted:

"Whereas there is now pending in the Senate of the United States a bill, Senate file No. 2202, introduced by Senator KENYON, of Iowa; and

"Whereas said bill proposes to delegate autocratic power to an appointee of the Secretary of Agriculture in that it provides that the person so appointed under the provisions of this act shall have sole control, direction, and supervision of the entire live stock, meat foods, and dairy business of the United States, subject only to the Secretary of Agriculture, in whom is vested power to make any such rules, regulations, or restrictions as he may see fit to impose upon those engaged in any of the varied branches of these industries; and

"Whereas the Sioux City Live Stock Exchange was organized for the purpose of protecting and promoting the interests of the live-stock producer and shipper and has ever been quick to oppose any proposed legislation detrimental to such interests; and

"Whereas it is proposed that live-stock commission firms in the conduct of their business shall be compelled by said bill to conduct their businesses only according to the direction of a political appointee, who may or may not have the interests of the live-stock producer at heart; and

"Whereas after a careful study of this bill and having had the benefit of observation of administration of the rail, telegraph, and telephone lines of our country by bureaus and political appointees, we believe that the passage of such a law would throw the live-stock industry of our country into a state of demoralization beyond all precedent in history; and

"Whereas we believe that any such legislation would delegate to an individual autocratic power, that such control if extended to the live-stock industry would soon be demanded for other branches of industry in our country, and that such control would result in equal demoralization in other lines of commerce; and

"Whereas we contend we have a constitutional right to advise our national legislators of our approval of and our opposition to any law, legislation, or regulation which it is proposed to enforce; and

"Whereas we do not accept dictation or direction from any person, corporation, or organization as to our acts in such matters: Be it now

"Resolved by the Sioux City Live Stock Exchange, organized for the purpose of protection to the interest of patrons of the public markets of the United States, That we do now register our most emphatic protest against the passage of the Kenyon bill or any bill of a similar nature; that we propose at all times and in all places to voice our opposition to such measures, believing them to be undemocratic, unfair, discriminatory, and confiscatory, and request our representatives in Congress to vigorously oppose any such measure; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of this exchange is instructed to forward at once to our representatives in both branches of the Congress of the United States and to representatives in Nebraska, South Dakota, North Dakota, and Minnesota a certified copy of this preamble and resolution."

AUBURN, ME., July 30, 1919.

To the Hon. BERT M. FERNALD,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned slaughterers and meat packers of Lewiston and Auburn, desire to put ourselves on record with you as being strongly opposed to the enactment of such legislation as is proposed in the Kenyon bill (S. 2202), the Kendrick bill (S. 2199), or bills similar thereto.

This is by far the largest slaughtering and packing center in the State of Maine. We handle Maine live stock practically exclusively. We sell our meat food products almost wholly to the State of Maine consumers. Our several businesses are solely owned by ourselves; hence are absolutely independent of any of the larger interests in the same line of business. Yet we honestly believe that such legislation as is above referred to is extremely prejudicial to the best interests of Maine live-stock producers, Maine consumers, and ourselves. Therefore, we hereby and over our signatures hereto most seriously and earnestly implore you to do everything possible to prevent the passage of such bills as are hereinbefore mentioned.

Very sincerely, yours,

E. W. PENLEY.

LITTLEFIELD & SONS CO.

We have testimony from a milk manufacturer, and also from a retailer, denying in each case that the packers are unfair in competition.

Some time ago the Chamber of Commerce of the United States appointed a committee of nine leading citizens without political, industrial, or personal bias, who followed closely the Federal Trade Commission's work for three years. It presented its findings a few months ago with annotated evidence from the commission's own formal statement. The report of this committee of nine citizens is set forth in seven specific specifications and printed in The Nation's Business, the official magazine of the chamber of commerce. These specifications are as follows:

First. The commission has undertaken the exercise of function beyond its own jurisdiction to the detriment of its proper usefulness.

Second. The commission has begun the study of important situations, but because of vacillating interests or for other reasons not apparent has left its work incomplete.

Third. The commission's procedure, originally orderly and appropriate, has changed without public notice or notice to Congress.

Fourth. The commission has abused its powers of publicity.

Fifth. Prominent features of the commission's recent food investigations were subversive of common justice.

Sixth. In presenting information to Congress and the public the commission has been heedless of the accuracy and frankness which its position and the circumstances required.

Seventh. The commission has departed from the fundamental purpose for which it was established.

With reference to specification 5, which has to do with the Federal Trade Commission's investigation of the packers, I want to submit as a part of my remarks the full report made by the committee from the Chamber of Commerce:

PROMINENT FEATURES OF THE COMMISSION'S RECENT FOOD INVESTIGATION WERE SUBVERSIVE OF COMMON JUSTICE.

On February 7, 1917, the President informed the commission it was "of the highest public concern to ascertain the truth or falsity" of allegations that "the course of trade in important food products is not free, but is restricted and controlled by artificial means," and directed the commission to investigate. Hiring a special counsel at a rate of $30,000 a year and expenses, although it had stated to a committee of Congress the salary would be at the rate of $5,000, it proceeded not in the spirit of the President's letter but with the apparent purpose of creating in advance a public impression that the allegations were true. It selected documents already in its possession and had them presented to it at public sessions by its special counsel, refusing to permit concerns that were mentioned in the documents to offer any testimony or produce other documents. It held public sessions at Boston, Philadelphia, St. Paul, and other cities, examined witnesses of its own choosing, and prevented cross-examination by the concerns at which it was made clear the proceedings were directed. At each city the special counsel or other members of the staff let it be known that the Government contemplated taking over and operating the industry. This strange spectacle ended at Chicago in February, 1918, when application was made on behalf of the commission for a search warrant under a section of the espionage act, and the circuit court of appeals quashed the warrant. The result of the commission's course was not to give information to the public, but to place the commission in the position of seeking to create prejudice which would support an apparently preconceived purpose to inaugurate Government operation of the business. In other words, before completing the investigation which the President directed, the commission appeared in the guise of attempting to force adoption of a legislative policy in a matter as to which it had not reported the facts. Another result was to prevent such a determination as the President requested and which he declared was of the highest public concern.

The seriousness of the consequences of the commission's course is apparent from the circumstance that the commission's representative took oath that crimes had been committed. If there was crime on the part of any person, the public welfare demands its immediate prosecution by the properly constituted authorities. It equally demands that the commission, which has no criminal jurisdiction, should sedulously refrain from alleging the perpetration of felonies which have not been proved in accordance with established legal procedure.

Although the commission stated in February, 1917, that its report of this investigation would be completed and published within eight months, and the services of its special counsel terminated on March 31, 1918, so much as a summary of a report regarding meat-packing, which the commission said would be the first food industry it would investigate, was not published until August 8 of this year. This summary of 47 pages the commission states is to be followed by seven reports in support of its conclusions and recommendations. In other words, the commission follows a method of publicity which causes its allegations to obtain wide circulation without opportunity for the public to know the grounds on which these allegations are made. Regarding the facts of the industry in question this committee, of course, is without information. It is in no sense in a position to express an opinion as to the merits of the commission's charges.

So here we have the judgment of a committee of the largest business organizations in the United States upon the character and efficiency of the Federal Trade Commission.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the personnel of the Federal Trade Commission. As I said a few moments ago, the commission was established with the idea of assisting the business interests of our country. But who compose the present commission? Is there a business man of recognized standing on it? I do not want to appear to discredit the Interstate Commerce Commission, for it has been helpful and has rendered excellent service in some instances. But have you ever stopped to think of the class of men who have controlled the policy of the Interstate Commerce Commission? In all these years of its existence it has been controlled mostly by lawyers, men of one profession. Very seldom has there been on the commission a business man, a manufacturer, a farmer, a shipper, or a railroad man trained in the business, except one. I believe there is one railroad man on the commission now, namely, Mr. Clark, who makes a good commissioner. Outside of Mr. Clark the present commission is made up of lawyers and teachers. If we are going to have a commission of this sort, I submit it is only fair to business that men who have some knowledge of the things with which these commissions deal should be represented on the commission. Many times the Interstate Commerce Commission has harassed and interfered with railroad management and development. This has been shown, I think, to the satisfaction of everyone since the war and after Government operation of the railroads.

And now, Mr. President, I come to the important question before the Senate, the Kenyon, Kendrick, and Moses bills, which I desire briefly to discuss.

First of all, and I think the most important feature of these bills, is the licensing provision. All packing companies, stockyard companies, commission firms, and dealers in poultry and dairy products must take out a license and submit to regulations by the Secretary of Agriculture through a commissioner of foodstuffs. The Kenyon bill also includes those companies that gather market information and publish price quotations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the Senator be willing to interpret that last sentence?

Mr. FERNALD. I am just coming to what the Senator has in mind, I think.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does it include every publication in the United States?

Mr. FERNALD. I so understand.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Practically every newspaper prints market reports.

Mr. FERNALD. I think so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, all must take out Government licenses?

Mr. FERNALD. I think so.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine asked not to be interrupted, but I feel that the statement made by the Senator from New York should not go unchallenged. The bill does nothing of the kind. The words used in the bill are "in connections with the stockyards," and such papers are the only ones to be affected.

Mr. FERNALD. But reports in the newspapers would be in connection with the stockyards.

Mr. KENYON. Certainly not. The language relates to stockyard papers and stockyard reports that are issued. There is no attempt, of course, to regulate what should be published in the newspapers, and the language can not be distorted to mean any such thing.

Mr. FERNALD. I think there might be some question as to the interpretation of the language.

Mr. KENYON. If there is, I will say very frankly there is no such intention; but, of course, I realize that those who are opposing the legislation can draw any kind of inference from the language that suits their biased minds.

Mr. FERNALD. I think the Senator knows that I would not undertake to be unfair in the matter.

Mr. KENYON. I understand that, and that is why I think the Senator has not sufficiently studied that provision of the bill.

Mr. FERNALD. The Kenyon bill also makes an exception of concerns engaged in the manufacture and preparation of poultry and dairy products who do a business of less than $500,000 a year.

The license-provision gives the Secretary of Agriculture power to suspend or revoke licenses. The Kenyon bill provides for the appointment of a receiver to run a business, or to close up its affairs in the case of revocation.

The Kenyon bill specifically gives the Secretary of Agriculture power to decide what products in addition to meats the packers may or may not handle.

These bills provide that the packers must get rid of their interest in stockyards.

The railroads must provide refrigerator cars, thus depriving the packers of their present equipment.

Mr. President, this proposed legislation opens up the whole question of Government regulation of private business. It is the opening wedge for the regulation and licensing of every business in this country. If the Federal Trade Commission has been quoted correctly, it plans to recommend and try to enforce a licensing system on all corporations. In the Washington Post of Friday, August 1, there appeared a news story, from which I take the following:

As a remedy the Federal Trade Commission generally is understood to favor a licensing system for a corporation doing an interstate business, the system to be applied first in those cases where the mulcting of the public has been most flagrant.

So here we have a Government body which is supposed to be helpful to business committed to a licensing system. This is socialistic. It is un-American, and means a blow to American initiative and to American genius.

I am opposed to this whole proposition; and there is no more reason, except for prejudice and misunderstanding, why the packing industry should be singled out for such legislation than the oil business, or the steel business, or any other interstate business. Once this principle is established with the packing industry and with butter and egg dealers, as provided in this bill, there is no reason at all why the same principle should not be extended so as to take in wholesale grocers and other classes of dealers. Because if it is big business and development that is to be under control of the Government certainly the wholesale grocers, some of whom have as many as four hundred retail stores under their control and continuously growing, would fall under the class of big business which needs to be told what it should do. But I am irrevocably opposed to the principle for any business.

Government interference will undoubtedly reduce the efficiency of the present organization of the packers, and thereby increase their expenses, and make them less able to take care of their business at the lowest possible operating cost and at the narrowest possible margin of profit.

The packing business is really a delicate mechanism. Expert skill and judgment are necessary at every step, from the purchase of live animals in the stockyard to the delivery of meat in prime condition to retailers hundreds of miles away. Even with the most expert skill available, and with constant attention to details, the whole complex process is accomplished at only a fraction of a cent a pound for products sold. The least derangement of this machinery on the part of inexperienced Government officials, whose appointment probably would be the result of political consideration, would without question have a serious effect not only on the packers themselves but on producers of live stock and consumers of meat.

The supply of live stock at the large markets varies from day to day and week to week, and can not be controlled by anyone, while in other lines of business most manufacturers can order such quantities of raw materials as they desire and have them delivered at convenient dates. But this is impossible in the packing industry, as live stock comes to market in a constant but unsteady stream. Manufacturers in other lines are in position to set a price for their products, and also regulate the purchase of material and the output of goods in accordance with the quantity that can be sold at the set price. But the packer is unable to control the demand for meats or the supply of live stock; nor has he anything to say about the production of live stock. Another point I wish to make is that the products of most all of the manufacturers are nonperishable and can be held over for an indefinite period. But the packer not only deals with live animals, but his manufactured products are very perishable, and he is compelled to sell the meat before it deteriorates, regardless of price. So he has two sets of fluctuating prices to contend with, those of live stock and those of dressed meat. One of the packer's most serious problems is to know market conditions so thoroughly that he can buy live stock and sell meats a week or two later in such a way as to average his quarter of a cent net profit, notwithstanding the fluctuations in prices of both factors.

Another thing, price fluctuations represent a high degree of competition. Take, for example, the markets for other commodities. Where competition is continuous and severe, as in an organized wheat market, the price oscillates continuously, but only an eighth of a cent at a time. In the potato market, which is not so highly organized and where competition is not so keen, the price remains about the same for days at a time, and jumps or falls a few cents a bushel. Steel rails, as you all remember, remained for years at $28 a ton. As a general rule, therefore, the less severe the competition the less frequent the fluctuation in price.

Recent experience with the railroads ought to be a sufficient object lesson to keep the Government from trying to interfere with the packing business. The railroad business is performed practically on constant rates. No bargaining ability and no expert judgment of day-to-day commercial conditions is necessary. The packing business deals with highly perishable products that fluctuate in value from day to day, and in which the purchase and sale require the highest degree of business sense and judgment. Interference with such a splendid machine would be much more disastrous than similar interference with the railroads.

The powers of control given under the license provision are too sweeping and too vague. Licensees are prohibited from doing certain specific things, such as to engage in unfair or discriminatory practices, or to sell to each other with a purpose of influencing prices, or to participate in the purchase or sale of commodities so as to substantially lessen competition, or to conspire or to combine or agree in any other way to suppress competition. The Secretary of Agriculture is given power to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, and there is grave danger, Mr. President, because of the vague character of the bill, that the Secretary of Agriculture may be able to say when and in what quantity the packers shall buy live stock, how long they may hold goods before offered for sale, etc. The bill gives specific power to control prices of poultry and various products, and there is a question whether this power may not even be exercised in regard to meat products.

Mr. President, to give an official of the Government any such powers over private business, and especially to have the bill so worded that it is impossible to tell how far such an official may go, is unthinkable in this country.

Power to suspend or revoke a license is in itself too drastic, and even the right of appeal to the courts is restricted. The power to suspend or revoke a license might well be used as a club to force licensees to submit to unfair and discriminatory regulations. The Kenyon bill says that the circuit court of appeals may not modify or set aside an order of the Secretary of Agriculture to suspend or revoke a license unless it can be shown that the order was unsupported by evidence, or was issued without due notice and reasonable opportunity to the licensee for a hearing, or infringes the Constitution, or is beyond the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture. In other words, right of appeal is so restricted that the circuit court of appeals is restrained from viewing the facts in the case if it can be shown that the Secretary of Agriculture gave a fair hearing and collected evidence. The appeal to the Supreme Court can be made only on a writ of certiorari, which the Supreme Court can grant or not, as it sees fit.

Senators, I submit this proposed legislation is unnecessary. There are ample laws on our statute books already to prevent any combination in restraint of trade and any unfair methods. But is there any combination or monopoly among the packers? Each of these Big Five packers affirmed before the Senate committee last winter that there was no form of agreement with other packers or among themselves to affect the price of live stock or meats. The Federal Trade Commission failed to get any evidence of combination in its report. It is only by unfair methods, by misinterpretation and misstatement of facts, that it is able to come to the conclusion that there is combination in restraint of trade.

There is proof in plenty of actual competition, as shown by the evidence submitted at the hearings last winter. The live stock is bought in the open market, where there are hundreds of buyers representing big and little packers, butchers, feeders, and speculators. The shipment of live stock from one market to another by speculators, thus keeping the markets in line with each other and making it impossible to manipulate the price, even if an attempt were made to do so; the fact that packers' profits are so small and vary from week to week, often becoming losses; the fact that fresh meat is perishable and has to be sold within a few days for what it will bring; the fact that the different packers have branch houses in the same city and solicit trade from the retailers; the fact that retail butchers shop around from the branch house of one packer to the branch house of the other, finding differences in prices and buying where prices are most favorable—these and many other things are unmistakable proofs of competition to the man who actually gets out in the market and who studies conditions first hand.

If there is any unfair competition or monopoly or any practices in trading that are not on the square, the Clayton antitrust law and the Federal Trade Commission law give ample power to suppress such illegal operations. It is significant, Mr. President, that the Federal Trade Commission has discovered no such practices, in spite of its combing of the country for prejudiced witnesses and dissatisfied competitors and customers of the packing industry.

Another complaint against the packers is made by the wholesale grocers. Let me say that there are more wholesale grocers in the country who are doing a packing business than there are packers who are in the grocery business. I am quite as well acquainted with the wholesale grocers of the country as I am with the packers. They are my customers and friends, and if I had any prejudice at all it would naturally be in their favor. They complain that the packers have gone far afield in the handling of other perishable products and products handled by the grocers themselves. This, I believe, is entirely unfounded.

I believe that by selling other products the packers have been a real benefit to the country. I believe that their reason for handling the other products is sound. I understand, however, that they handle such small quantities of these products that there is no ground for the complaint that they are getting control of the food supply of the Nation. The same argument made by the wholesale grocers could be used against them for handling drugs, hardware, automobile supplies, and many other goods entirely out of their line.

The packers explain that they have engaged in the produce business for the reason that they can utilize their magnificent selling organization, including refrigerator cars, branch houses, and salesmen, to better advantage, thereby decreasing unit selling costs both for meat, poultry, eggs, and butter. This argument sounds plausible, and I can not see why it has not been a good thing for the country.

Mr. President, to me it is unthinkable that Congress should give the Government power to say what products a concern may or may not handle. If this principle is established for the packers, it might as well be established for a mail-order business or a department store, which handles nearly everything. Are we going to put a limit in this country upon a man's endeavor? Are we going to say to the manufacturer, or the merchant, or the banker, or to any other kind of business in this country, "You can only do so much business; you may engage in only certain kinds of business; and when you have accomplished certain things you must stop"? That, Mr. President, is what this proposed legislation will bring about.

These bills before the Senate would take away from the packers their refrigerator cars, which would mean poorer service and higher costs. The very reason packers own their refrigerator cars is because the railroads refused to furnish this equipment. If they had not built their own cars they would not have been able to develop their own business, and neither would the country at large have been served so well with fresh meat and other foods. Through long years of experience they have developed a transportation department that routes the cars and watches their movements, sees that they lose no time in transit, and keeps them clean and properly repaired. As a result the packers' cars cover more miles in a year than any other class of freight cars.

The Interstate Commerce Commission made an exhaustive study of private car lines, and in its report of July 31, 1918, came to the following conclusion, which seems to bear out the packers' argument——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FERNALD. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but in connection with the packing business I think it is necessary to discuss not only the meat products but all the by-products. I am just saying this to get the Senator's view. It is charged, of course, that the packers handle some 562 other products besides meat. It is also charged that the packers control certain by-products, such as hides, for instance. I think the Federal Trade Commission has submitted a report which shows that the Big Five packers really control the hide industry. I am simply stating that the report shows that. I think the last report made by the Federal Trade Commission—which I had not read and did not know what it contained until the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] called my attention to it to-day—shows that these Big Five packers really control the meat industry in a large percentage—between 70 and 80 per cent.

Mr. FERNALD. Excuse me; I think the Senator was out when I took up that matter. I showed just what per cent they did control. I think the Senator from North Dakota was absent at the time.

Mr. GRONNA. I am just coming to that. I heard the Senator's statement. I had an idea that they controlled only 40 per cent, but I think the 40 per cent has reference to all the meat—meat slaughtered on farms and in local butcher shops, and all that.

Mr. FERNALD. The inspected meat.

Mr. GRONNA. That is the question I should like to ask the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, there has been a good deal of confusion about that. Is not this the situation: As to the meat that goes into commerce, they control about 73 per cent and a fraction. Taking all the meat in the country, killed on the farm, in local butcher shops, and so forth, the figures are those that the Senator gave—some forty-odd per cent. I think that is the difference.

Mr. GRONNA. That may be.

Mr. FERNALD. I should like to finish the discussion of this car business, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. GRONNA. There was just one other question, if the Senator will yield further. I was very much confused about two things.

Mr. FERNALD. I should like to answer the question which the Senator has just suggested in regard to the control of the grocery business.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. FERNALD. I assume that the complaint of the wholesale grocers, if they have any complaint, is for the reason that the packers are underselling them. Certainly if the packers asked more for their goods than the wholesale grocers, they would not have any serious competition. The very thing we are trying to do by this proposed legislation, as I understand, is to lower the high cost of living. If that can be done without the middlemen that we hear so much about, and if it is true that the packer can produce his goods and deliver them to the consumer at a lower price than the wholesale grocer, I can not see why the Congress of the United States or the consumers should find any fault with the packers. I think that answers that question.

Mr. GRONNA. That partly answers it; but I think the wholesale grocers also charge discrimination. The big packers, of course, have refrigerator cars. They get out what they call these peddler cars.

Mr. FERNALD. They have their cars because that is the only way in which they can ship their goods. The railroad companies failed to furnish cars, and in order that they might have them they had to build them themselves.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very sorry that I am taking up so much of the time of the Senator, but there is another question I should like to ask.

Mr. FERNALD. Go on, Senator; I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. In fact, I did not quite complete the first question. The large packers and the small packers all agree that they made more profit during the control by the Federal Government than they had ever made.

Mr. FERNALD. Does not that apply to everybody?

Mr. GRONNA. I ask the question then, "Why do you oppose Government control?"

Mr. FERNALD. For the same reason that the Senator would not like to have this Government control the wheat situation.

Mr. GRONNA. I was about to state that that question was answered in a way that satisfied me that it was because of the fear which the business entertained.

Mr. FERNALD. Exactly.

Mr. GRONNA. But there is another question which I think is fundamental, and that is this: "We say that the Big Five packers have reached the very apex of efficiency, but in the face of that it is admitted by the small packers that the Big Five are not driving them out of business. They are permitted to make not only reasonable but large profits. That is a matter, I think, which has never been explained. I know the Senator is well informed, and I wish he would explain it.

Mr. FERNALD. I think that the small packer, the man who can efficiently and economically manage his own business a little better than another man, will always succeed. We have near by this city, in Baltimore, some of the most enterprising packing concerns in this country, all of them prosperous. There is always a great demand for foodstuffs; and the packing business is a little different from anything else, because the population of the country is continually increasing and making a demand for the packers' products, and I am frank to say that in the past few years there has not been enough encouragement to the packers so that there have been many new establishments. As I said a little while ago, we ought to have building in this country to-day more than 100 large canneries, and yet there have been very few built in the last five years.

Now, I am on this private-car business, Senator.

This is from the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission and is found on page 763 of their report:

> The system of the use and supply of private cars that now exists can not be at once and radically changed without serious consequences to shippers, carriers, and the public.

On page 683 the Interstate Commerce Commission says:

> As a rule, carriers have never furnished these cars, and it has come to be mutually understood that they should not do so. The oil refiner and meat packer demand an adequate supply of cars at all times. It is conceded by shippers that neither an adequate supply nor an efficient distribution can be afforded by carriers. The requirements have been that there shall be the most efficient use of tank and refrigerator cars, which has been one of the results of private ownership. While this has undoubtedly been of benefit to carriers, it has been of incalculable benefit to shippers as well.

Again on page 691 the Interstate Commerce Commission also reports:

> These great shippers of perishable articles have been used to the fullest extent of their splendidly effective organizations to secure prompt service for their cars used in shipments of their products.

There are too few meat refrigerator cars now in the United States, and it is only with the most careful following up of their cars that the packers make them serve their purpose. If the railroads were required to furnish all the cars it would be necessary to have many more cars than are now in operation, because the railroads could not handle them as efficiently and expeditiously as do the transportation departments of the packers. It would also be a tremendous expense to the railroads, who have already been starved by Government restrictions for the past 10 years, and who are not in a position to undertake this additional expense. Nothing could be gained by taking the refrigerator cars away from the packers and extending their use. The reason that the proponents of this legislation want the cars taken from the packers is that they feel that many smaller shippers need more cars than they can get at present. If this is the case the logical remedy is to require the railroads to furnish enough cars to satisfy smaller shippers who can not afford to own them, rather than to cripple the service of the large packers and the country generally by doing away with the present splendid organization.

The proposed bills would force the packers to sell their interests in stockyards on the theory that their ownership gives them power over prices and also the control of the market. The packers, at the hearings before the Senate committee, vigorously denied this charge, and declared that the markets are free and open to all buyers of live stock, and that their ownership in the stockyards has no control over prices or in trading whatsoever.

The packers assert that they became interested in the stockyards principally to insure adequate facilities for taking care of live animals and for rendering proper service. If we are to believe these gentlemen, their ownership has nothing to do with the control over prices and if in other hands would probably mean poorer facilities and poorer service, and this would react to the detriment of the live-stock shippers as much, if not more, than to the packers.

But I believe, in their testimony before the Senate committee, they declare they were willing to surrender their interests in the stockyards if they were compensated for their investments.

So, Mr. President, I am unalterably opposed to these bills. I am not personally interested in any of the so-called big packers. I do not know a single one of them. But I am greatly interested in and deeply concerned about the success and welfare of American business men. I am a business man myself, and I know how the business men of the country feel about this sort of legislation.

Mr. President, I wonder sometimes where we are drifting. We are living in an uncertain age. Conditions have changed. The World War has turned things upside down. Some good-meaning gentlemen would steer our good old ship out into new channels and run us into new harbors—or maybe upon the rocks. I sometimes think our whole civilization is in danger, a civilization that has required ages to build and at a great sacrifice. In these days of uncertainty and unrest we hear new and strange voices—voices which speak a language foreign to American traditions and American teachings. If there ever was a time in the history of this Republic when we should stand firmly and squarely upon our feet, that time is now. Let us not be led away into new fields and untrodden paths, but let us hold fast to those things that have made us the great Nation we are to-day. Let business alone. Why heckle and harass it? History will show, Mr. President, that in all past trials of this country our business men have stood like a rock for their country. It has been so in the past, and I venture to say that the business men of to-day will be the last to embrace these strange theories of government that we hear discussed. The American business man is the bulwark of our institutions, and if this country escapes the hysteria, the new innovations, that some would throw upon us, it will be through the calm common sense of the American business man. If the torch of commerce is to be lighted again in this country of ours and to shine on as in the past, the guiding light of the nations of the world, it is the hand of the American business man that must hold it aloft.

So, Mr. President, in behalf of the business men of this country, in behalf of those who have had as much to do in making our country great as any other class of citizens, I want to protest here and now against this proposed legislation. It is filled with danger to our institutions and our system of government. It is socialistic, it is un-American, and should be defeated.

The stifling, throttling legislation which has been applied to the railroads has stamped out all the initiative and ambition of railroad men. But if we again enact laws of reasonable fairness and justice to the railroad systems of the country there will be new development and greater progress, and we shall achieve a transportation system adequate to mobilize the economic resources of our Nation in a manner to excite the admiration and the wonder of mankind.

And in similar manner, if those men who are constantly pointing to the owners of the big business enterprises and criticizing oftentimes the men and motives rather than the methods will desist from attempting to dictate to the big industries of the country, again the opportunity will present itself to our young business men of ambition and initiative and genius. Remove the shackles that some men are attempting to place upon the business interests of this country. Give them a fair field. Open the avenues of commerce, stimulate trade. Let each in his way work out the great industrial problems before us.

Then will follow, in my judgment, a peace and prosperity to our Government such as the world has never known. And instead of attempting to make big business little, let us all pull together to make little business big. Where industry creates and justice protects, prosperity dwells.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a few days ago the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] introduced some figures on the question of the high cost of living. In reply thereto I wish to introduce a statement of the Bureau of Markets, Department of Agriculture. I ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in my judgment these figures absolutely refute the position taken by Senator REED in a recent speech made by him on the subject of cold storage and the high cost of living generally.

It will be noted that no eggs have been exported at all, and while there is a greater supply of eggs in this country than ever before, the prices have gone up this year over last.

It will also be noted in the case of butter that in 1918 there were, in round numbers, 17,000,000 pounds of butter exported, and in 1919, 33,000,000 pounds, a difference of 16,000,000 pounds. This would seem to uphold a contention of Senator REED, but when we look at the butter on hand this year and that on hand in 1918, it will be seen how misleading Senator REED's figures are. The 16,000,000 pounds additional exports for 1919 is inconsiderable when considered in connection with the enormous increase of the holding of butter on August 1, 1919. There was a holding of butter of 124,839,792 pounds on August 1, 1919. On August 1, 1918, there were 88,786,243 pounds of butter, an increase of 40 per cent. The increase in pounds, in round numbers, is 36,000,000 pounds. You could subtract from this 36,000,000 pounds the 16,000,000 pounds exported and we still would have 20,000,000 pounds more of butter in 1919 than we had in 1918.

Again, take the figures for cheese. In round numbers there were 26,000,000 pounds less of cheese exported in 1919 than in 1918, and yet in 1919, in round numbers, there were 75,000,000 pounds on hand, while in 1918 there were about 26,000,000 pounds on hand, and still cheese has gone up.

Take beef. There were 370,000,000 pounds exported in 1918 and 332,000,000 pounds in 1919, while there was on hand in 1919 159,000,000 pounds and in 1918 172,000,000 pounds, and yet beef has gone up.

In other words, there were 38,000,000 pounds less exported, which, added to the 159,000,000 pounds on hand in 1919, would make more than there was on hand in 1918, including the exports, and yet prices have gone up.

POULTRY.

Again, take the matter of poultry. In round numbers there were 40,000,000 pounds of poultry on August 1, 1919, as against 18,000,000 pounds in 1918. Apparently we exported more poultry, and yet the price has gone up 4½ cents per pound. These figures are irrefutable and no amount of mathematical legerdemain can disprove them.

Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an advertisement of the Sanitary Grocery Co. (Inc.), of Washington, D. C., as it appeared in the Evening Star of Monday, August 18, 1919. The advertisement is headed:

Passing the buck. It is a great national pastime, but we refuse to let anyone pass it to us.

The advertisement, among other things, says:

We are going to show just how much truth there is in the statement made by Mr. L. B. H. Weld before the House Agricultural Committee, as reported in the Star and which we reproduce herewith. Mr. Weld is quoted as saying that eggs which represent the cost to the retailer of 45 cents per dozen were sold to the consumer at 75 and 80 cents per dozen. We challenge Mr. Weld or anyone else to produce evidence that anyone ever sold cold-storage eggs in Washington at such a price.

It appears that the next day Mr. Weld denied that he had made such a statement as attributed to him in the Star, and the Star admitted that he had made no such statement, and thereupon there appeared another advertisement from the Sanitary Grocery Co. to the effect that inasmuch as Mr. Weld did not charge that the Washington retailers had sold eggs at 75 to 80 cents per dozen, they considered the matter ended, and I believe apologized to Mr. Weld.

Mr. President, that is all right so far as the Washington retailers are concerned, but the figures submitted by Mr. Weld and the figures given in this advertisement were conclusive that Mr. Weld had, either intentionally or unintentionally, misrepresented the facts and had misrepresented the profits received by the packers on eggs.

From page 267 of the hearings of the Committee on Agriculture, cold-storage legislation, part 6, I quote as follows from Mr. Weld's testimony:

Approximate average marketing cost of eggs, Iowa to Washington, D. C., 1918.

Price paid farmer in Iowa	$0.33
Expense of handling, grading, and freight	.03½
Cost net storage in Chicago	.36½
Storage expense (storage, insurance, and interest)	.03
Freight to Washington	.01½
Selling, candling, and grading, including spoilage	.03
Total profit storage and selling	.01
Price delivered retail in Washington	.45

Now, it may be true that Weld was misquoted as to what the retailer sold the eggs for in Washington, but he is not misquoted as to what the packer sold the eggs for, delivered to the retailers in Washington. Mr. Weld says that they were delivered to the retailer in Washington for 45 cents, and the packers made a total profit of 1 cent per dozen. The figures submitted by the Sanitary Grocery Co. show that this statement is not true, but that the eggs were delivered from the packers at an average of about 50 cents per dozen, or about 4 cents to 5 cents more profit per dozen on eggs than Mr. Weld testified. In other words, Mr. Weld may have made his peace with the retailers in Washington, but he has simply "passed the buck" to the people.

The argument was made that because of our increased exportation of poultry prices of poultry are higher. As a matter of fact, we do not export poultry, and there is three times as much poultry on hand this year as there was last year. If the law of supply and demand is in force, of course the price ought to be cheaper, but as a matter of fact it is 4½ cents a pound higher. So it is with cheese, with beef, with lambs and mutton and almost all articles of food. The stocks on hand in this country are enormously increased over those on hand last year, and at the same time the prices have increased, and I say have increased largely over what we have exported as well, taking those figures into consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator really believe it is a splendid thing to have more poultry, butter, and meat on hand in cold-storage plants to-day than there was a year ago?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am delighted to know that there is, and it ought to be correspondingly cheaper to the people. It is not a good thing unless the people get the advantage of it. What good is it to the people of the United States if it is held in cold storage waiting for higher prices?

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that last year the exports were so heavy that they could not get the usual quantity of poultry and food products into the cold-storage plants.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not exportations of poultry, because poultry is not exported.

Mr. SMOOT. I saw only yesterday a statement that the Government now has in cold-storage plants in New York nearly 2,000,000 pounds of poultry.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is for our Army.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; but it is for exportation.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is exportation in one sense, and in another sense it is not. As a matter of fact, that does not mean exportation. Sending it to our troops abroad is not exporting it. I have here a report from the Department of Agriculture which shows that there is no exportation of poultry.

Mr. SMOOT. I am only speaking of the exportation of poultry that went to our Army, because our Army was fed poultry, I think, two days a week. I know that the Government has millions of pounds of poultry in cold-storage plants in this country. This is what I want to have borne in mind. It must be conceded by everyone that now is the time that the greatest quantities of butter and poultry should be found in cold storage, as the time of year for the greatest production has passed, and unless there is more in cold-storage plants in the country than there was a year ago at this time the prices during the coming winter will be even higher, if possible, than they were last winter. The Senator knows that poultry was sold at 90 cents a pound, and it was sold less than a month ago at 75 cents a pound here in the District.

So, Mr. President, I think where cold storage is regulated as to the length of time products may remain there, it is a godsend to the American people that there is a cold-storage system in the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. No one disputes that; and if the Senator means to say that he is in favor of regulation so as to make the packers and other cold-storage men do right, so as to make them obey the law of supply and demand, I agree with him entirely. What I have asked for is the just regulation of cold storage. Nothing more. Of course, any man on earth with any sense knows that cold storage is one of the greatest benefactions to the human race. Nobody is against cold storage.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that the Senator was complaining of the amount of butter in cold storage and the amount of poultry in cold-storage plants to-day.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the Senator misunderstood me entirely. What I say is that under the cold-storage system now, unregulated, those who are engaged in the cold-storage business or the food business, and who use cold storage, can withhold the products from market at will or put them on the market at will, thus controlling the prices of food to the people; that the law of supply and demand is not in force as to them, because, practically without cost after having gone into cold storage, they can withhold products or put them on the market at will. That ought not to be the case. They ought to be regulated and forced to do what cold storage was intended for, to carry over from the season of plenty to the season of scarcity and give the people food during all seasons at reasonable prices.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is absolutely true, and I think, generally speaking, that is done. I know if we had no cold storage for eggs, for instance, the price of eggs last winter would have been $2 a dozen. The Senator knows that there is a propaganda all over the United States to try to make the American people believe that the cause of high prices to-day is the cold-storage system. For instance, I notice that the papers report 5,000,000 eggs on hand in a cold-storage plant in the South. Never before was the quantity reported except in cases. To state to-day to the American people that there were 3,000 cases of eggs on hand does not sound like very many eggs, but multiplied by the number of eggs that there are in a case it seems quite a number.

There should be in the United States cold storage of all necessaries of life sufficient to carry the supply over during the season in which there is little or no production.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator entirely about that. There is no difference between us on that point.

Mr. SMOOT. Any legislation that interferes with such a course will be most expensive legislation to the American people.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator entirely in his last statement that there should be no interference with cold storage itself. The proper uses of cold storage should be encouraged rather than hindered. The bill which I have introduced and which is now before the Committee on Interstate Commerce does not in the slightest degree affect the proper use of cold storage or the institution of cold storage. The only thing it does is to reinstate the law of supply and demand as to food products kept in cold storage so that those who use cold storage can not use it for the purpose of boosting prices at will or controlling prices. That is the substance of what is provided for in the bill.

Now, let us see how it works, Senators, about propaganda. There is propaganda on both sides. On last Monday afternoon there was an advertisement printed in the Washington Star called "Passing the buck," and I desire to insert that advertisement in the RECORD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Evening Star, Monday, Aug. 18, 1919.]

"PASSING THE BUCK"—IT'S THE GREAT NATIONAL PASTIME, BUT WE REFUSE TO LET ANYONE PASS IT TO US.

We are going to show just how much truth there is in the statement made by Mr. L. B. H. Weld before the House Agriculture Committee as reported in the Star and which we reproduce herewith. Mr. Weld is quoted as saying that eggs which represented a cost to the retailer of 45 cents per dozen were sold to consumers for 75 cents and 80 cents per dozen. We challenge Mr. Weld or anyone else to produce evidence for the statement that anyone ever sold cold-storage eggs in Washington at such a price.

In the first place he is speaking of cold-storage eggs—that is, eggs which were carried from the spring until fall in cold-storage warehouses. We handle a few eggs ourselves, and the accusation of profiteering rests upon us as well as all other retailers. We feel that the public is fair-minded, and we are going to present a few figures. You can then judge for yourself as to who, if anyone, profiteered, especially as Mr. Weld says that 45 cents was the price at which the retailer should have bought these eggs.

If 45 cents per dozen was the price, why were we compelled to pay Swift & Co. the figures as shown on the immediate right?

Recapitulation of purchases.

	Dozens.	Cost.
Swift & Co.	9,450	$4,656.75
Armour & Co.	12,000	5,640.00
Morris & Co.	24,750	12,420.00
Cudahy Packing Co.	29,910	14,437.60
Other purchases	6,750	3,465.00
Total	82,860	40,618.75

Eighty-two thousand eight hundred and sixty dozen cold storage—or, as the newspaper reporters write it, nearly 1,000,000 eggs; to be exact it figures 994,320. Merely to show you that our egg distribution is a vital factor when considering a matter of this kind.

We do not mention any purchases after January 1, 1919, as shortly thereafter we began handling fresh eggs only. Compare these figures with our cost prices on same date.

Evidence in black and white as to what these eggs retailed for in our store.

These prices taken from our advertisements which appeared in the Evening Star:

Quoted Oct. 21, 1918 (cold-storage eggs)	50
Quoted Nov. 7, 1918 (cold-storage eggs)	50
Quoted Nov. 11, 1918 (cold-storage eggs)	52
Quoted Nov. 21, 1918 (cold-storage eggs)	55
Quoted Nov. 25, 1918 (cold-storage eggs)	57

See any 75-cent or 80-cent prices here?

For the month of December no advertised prices were shown, but our records show that notwithstanding increased cost to us our price on cold-storage eggs never exceeded 57 cents. Also remember that the District Food Administration was in full swing until after January 1, 1919. Let us quote from the fair price list in the Evening Star of December 6, 1918:

"Cold-storage eggs—dealer pays 50 cents to 55 cents, sells 57 cents to 63 cents."

Shortly after January 1 we discontinued the sale of storage eggs, as it is usual for us to do each year.

Prices following were quoted by us in the Evening Star on each date indicated:

Our selling price on fresh eggs was

RETAILER'S PROFIT ON EGGS INDICATED—L. B. H. WELD COMPARES PRICE CHARGED WITH COST OF DELIVERY ON MARKET.

While consumers in Washington were paying 75 and 80 cents a dozen for eggs last winter they represented an investment of 33 cents to the farmer and 45 cents delivered to the retailer, according to testimony by L. B. H. Weld, manager of commercial research for Swift & Co., before the House Agricultural Committee, which is investigating the high price of cold-storage products.

The price paid for the eggs to a farmer in Iowa, according to Mr. Weld, was 33 cents a dozen. Expense of handling, grading, and freight was 3½ cents, making a total cost of 36½ cents in the cold storage in Chicago. Storage expense is 3 cents, freight to Washington, 1½ cents; selling, candling, grading, and spoilage, 3 cents; and profits of storage and selling is 1 cent. This brings the total to 45 cents a dozen, when the eggs reach the Washington retailers.

Mr. Weld estimated that 62 to 66 per cent of the retail price goes to the farmer if eggs are sold at 50 or 53 cents.

Mr. Weld told the committee that profit of the packers on beef and veal in storage is about one-half cent a pound. He said that the beef brought to Washington has been killed only two weeks.

[From the Sunday Star, Aug. 17, 1919. First page, column 8.]

BELIEVE RETAILERS PROFITEER.

While the packers and other big corporate interests may be responsible for a general boosting of prices throughout the country, the members of the District committees have been told that retail dealers here have been profiteering. The Federal Trade Commission report on the high prices of shoes made it plain that the commission had found the retail dealers making exorbitant profits. The testimony of a commercial expert for one of the packers before the House Committee on Agriculture showed exactly what it cost to buy eggs from farmers in Iowa and to deliver them to the retailer in Washington—45 cents at a time that the consumer was being charged 75 and 80 cents.

These two instances are a matter of record before Congress, and Members of the House committee say they can produce similar testimony along other lines.

Why let an outsider come into Washington and bring an accusation of this kind against hundreds of reputable merchants of this city? Ask him to prove it with figures.

We are in hopes the House Agricultural Committee will recall Mr. Weld and have him tell them what became of all the 45-cent eggs that Washington dealers were not able to buy even from the firm he "researches" for.

We have researched several times ourselves—and haven't found many.

When you read testimony of this character about how the retail grocer has been gouging you

Call on us. Perhaps we can pull the facts and figures and prove to you that

You have been misinformed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to read from that advertisement these words:

"Passing the buck."

It's the great national pastime. But we refuse to let anyone pass it to us.

We are going to show just how much truth there is in the statement made by Mr. L. B. H. Weld before the House Agricultural Committee as reported in the Star and which we reproduce herewith. Mr. Weld is quoted as saying that eggs which represented a cost to the retailer of 45 cents per dozen were sold to consumers for 75 cents and 80 cents per dozen. We challenge Mr. Weld or anyone else to produce evidence for the statement that anyone ever sold cold-storage eggs in Washington at such a price.

That advertisement is signed by the Sanitary Grocery Co., of Washington, D. C. It is rather a remarkable fact that on the next day another advertisement came out in the Star about this matter, in which the Sanitary Grocery Co. admitted that they had misquoted Mr. Weld in reference to certain matters contained in that report. The advertisement was to the effect that Mr. Weld had brought proof to them that he had not said that the retailers of Washington had retailed those eggs at 75 cents a dozen, but had said they were sold at some 50-odd cents a dozen, and they therefore made Mr. Weld an apology for having advertised the matter in the way they did. But, unfortunately for Mr. Weld and for those whom he represents, when he got the Sanitary Grocery Co.'s apology he was simply "passing the buck" to the American people.

I want to read to the Senate just what Mr. Weld did say, for it is very short. I read from his testimony before the House Committee on Agriculture. I desire to call the especial attention of the Senate to these figures submitted by Mr. Weld:

Approximate average marketing cost of eggs, Iowa to Washington, D. C., 1818, price paid to farmer in Iowa, 33 cents.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] is present and can tell what the farmers of his State got for eggs last year.

Expense of handling, grading, and freight, 3½ cents.
Making total of 36½ cents in Iowa.
Cost into storage in Chicago, 36½ cents.

To that Mr. Weld adds:

Storage expense (storage, insurance, and interest), 3 cents.
Freight to Washington, 1½ cents.
Selling, candling, and grading (including spoilage), 3 cents.
Total profit (storage and selling), 1 cent.

That is the total profit to the packer.

Price delivered to retailer in Washington, 45 cents.

In other words, Mr. Weld's testimony is to the effect the packers were not profiteering but were making only 1 cent a dozen upon eggs. That is the reasonable inference from his testimony. I take it that there can not be any dispute about that.

The advertisement that the Sanitary Grocery Co. published on Monday last produces the bills and the amounts of money paid by it to the packers. Senators can read the advertisement in the RECORD. There are in it to be found quite a number of bills mounting into the thousands of dozens of eggs and thousands of dollars. The average price is a little less than 50 cents a dozen to retailers here in Washington. In other words, instead of the packers, according to Mr. Weld's testimony and according to these paid bills for eggs bought by the Sanitary Grocery Co., being delivered to the retailers in Washington at a cent profit to the packers, they were delivered according to this proof, at between 5 and 6 cents profit to the packers per dozen. Of course, a little difference of 4 or 5 cents Mr. Weld may not think material, but considering the millions of dozens of eggs that are sold in this country the difference will be very great. Mr.

Weld evidently desired to submit to the committee that the packers' profit was only 1 cent per dozen. He evidently believed that was a reasonable profit. He thought that would appeal to anyone as reasonable. The figures of this advertisement show that the packers made, in round numbers, 5 cents additional on the very eggs Mr. Weld was talking about. Five cents a dozen would mean a great saving to many families buying eggs.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Were any of the eggs sold here to dealers at the prices suggested by Mr. Weld?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will give the prices to the Senator. The grocery company bought, it seems, from several cold-storage houses, several packing companies. On November 4, 3,000 dozen at 46 cents; on November 5, 3,000 dozen at 46 cents; on November 7, 3,000 dozen at 46 cents; on December 5, 1,500 dozen at 50 cents; and on December 5, 1,500 dozen at 50 cents.

From Morris & Co.—all of these are cold-storage eggs—they bought on November 7, 750 dozen at 48 cents; November 21, 750 dozen at 49 cents; November 22, 120 dozen at 49 cents.

Mr. Weld testified they were all delivered here at 45 cents.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That they were all delivered at 45 cents?

Mr. McKELLAR. He figured that they were all delivered at 45 cents.

Now, so that the Senate may have the figures showing that the price goes considerably above this amount, I read the following:

150 dozen, at 49 cents.
480 dozen, at 49 cents.
1,500 dozen, at 49 cents.
750 dozen, at 49 cents.
750 dozen, at 49 cents.
750 dozen, at 49 cents.
750 dozen, at 49 cents.
1,500 dozen, at 49 cents.
600 dozen, at 49 cents.
13,500 dozen, at 51 cents.
410 dozen, at 49 cents.
450 dozen, at 49 cents.
1,500 dozen, at 51 cents.

From the Cudahy Packing Co. the prices were on November 4, 44½ cents per dozen, and on December 23, 53 cents. Other prices run for other cold-storage eggs bought from other companies from 50 cents to 54 cents. In other words, the lowest price was 44½ cents a dozen and the highest price was 54 cents—an average of between 49 and 50 cents.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The testimony shows, then, that in some cases eggs were sold here at a price less than the price testified to by Mr. Weld.

Mr. McKELLAR. In only a few cases.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In only a few cases.

Mr. McKELLAR. Only as to 4,500 dozen.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from Tennessee is basing this all on Iowa eggs.

Mr. McKELLAR. On Iowa eggs; yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Has the price of Iowa eggs remained the same during all of the period covered by these shipments?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is not explained whether it has or not. Are Iowa eggs, for instance, different from Michigan eggs? I do not know that there is any difference between them.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am thinking about Michigan eggs.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are Michigan eggs better than Iowa eggs?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know something about eggs, but I did not know that there was that difference between eggs coming from Iowa and those coming from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of course, there are no better eggs in the world than Michigan eggs; but what I desire to get at is that the price of eggs in Michigan, as I suppose in every other place, differs from week to week, and sometimes from day to day.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course it does.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was wondering how the Senator could fix the price at 33 cents, or whatever the Senator did fix it at, and say that he is comparing that with the selling price for that whole period, without knowing what the eggs actually cost.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will remember that I am not fixing these prices or this method of arriving at prices at all; but what I am doing is what the Senator is doing—criticizing what the agent of the packers has done when he undertakes to fix the price at which the retailers in Washington receive their eggs at 45 cents a dozen. Of course that is not correct; anybody in the world would know that it was not correct.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am very much in favor of the object the Senator from Tennessee has in getting exact information, for unless we do have all the facts and all the circumstances surrounding them, statements will be misleading and of no value to us at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If we could find a particular shipment of eggs and could trace that shipment from the farmer to the consumer, we would obtain some information that would be exceedingly valuable to us in determining whether or not there has been profiteering.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator, in answer to his suggestion, that the set of figures in this advertisement is as perfect proof as any I have seen. Evidently the Sanitary Grocery Co., of Washington, felt that it had not been profiteering, and according to its figures it surely had not; and evidently the Sanitary Grocery Co., of Washington, to use its own language, wanted to "pass the buck" to some one else. I am using simply the language employed by it. It does give the exact prices that it paid, and also gives the exact prices that it received. According to its figures, there was no profiteering, but the profiteering was done by the packers.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the Senator who is Mr. Weld?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Weld is the agent of one of the packers, so I am informed—I forget which; perhaps all of them, but I think primarily of Swift & Co. I do not know, of course, just how his salary is paid; I do not know anything about that. Mr. Swift has not answered my question on that subject yet. I am merely calling attention to the very marked difference between his testimony and the unquestioned facts as submitted in this advertisement, and showing why Mr. Weld might have thought that when the Sanitary Grocery Co. apologized for having put into his mouth the statement that the Sanitary Grocery Co. and other retailers here in Washington had been selling eggs at 75 and 80 cents a dozen that that cleaned the slate; but the potent fact in these disclosures is that Mr. Weld was trying to show to the Agricultural Committee of the House that the company only received 1 cent profit, when, according to the facts stated in the first advertisement, that are undisputed in the second advertisement—and of course they would have been disputed if they had not been true—and the facts shown by the bills on which payment was made, they received between 5 and 6 cents profit on some eggs. Whether that is an unusual profit, whether that is profiteering, I am not prepared to say, though I think it is, and evidently Mr. Weld thought such a figure was, as he testified the packers only made 1 cent; but I agree with the Senator from Michigan about the desirability of having other facts. We ought to have the packers show us what they are paying the producers for the eggs. If they are wrong about what they sell them for—if they are 4 or 5 cents wrong about what they sell them for, as shown in the facts herein published—it is reasonable to suppose that they may be mistaken as to the amount they paid to the producers of the eggs, and the real facts might double the amount of their profits. The producers should be protected as well as the consumers.

Those are the things that I wish to call to the attention of the Senate to-day. I put these statistics in the RECORD so that Senators may read them and see how fallacious the argument is that it is because of our exports prices are going up this year. The exports have little influence on prices, as these figures show, and can not have an influence on the prices so long as unrestricted, unregulated cold storage is permitted in this country.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I have just listened to the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] on the high cost of living. I have in my hand a letter from E. S. Brigham, Commissioner of Agriculture of Vermont, a man of recognized ability, and it seems to me so pertinent to the remarks that have just been made by the Senator from Tennessee that I am going to send it to the desk and ask that it be read. It is only about 20 lines in length.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the communication.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE OF VERMONT,
DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Montpelier, August 13, 1919.

Hon. C. S. PAGE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I was somewhat surprised to read the President's address on the high cost of living and to see his announcement that credits and facilities for shipping our wheat abroad would be so controlled that the price of wheat here would be held down.

When the guaranteed minimum price of $2.26, Chicago basis, was fixed September 2, 1918, the President promised to appoint a commission to investigate the fairness of this price in the spring of 1919 and to make adjustment if conditions warranted. Now that the war is closed, it seems to me an imposition upon the American wheat raiser for the Government to use its powers of manipulating credit and shipping facilities so that the President's guaranteed minimum will become in effect a maximum, and this without any investigation as to whether the present price of wheat yields to the producer a fair return.

I noted also that the President asked Congress for a continuation of the food-control act in time of peace. I served in the Food Administration long enough to secure evidence that the food-control act was used to the great disadvantage of the producer in manipulating prices in ways which are unknown to the public. It seems to me that the best remedy for the high cost of living is to allow prices of food commodities to rise to the point where farmers can hire labor to produce these commodities in competition with the railroads and other classes of industry. When this is done we may have an increased production, which will solve our problem. On the other hand, if we make conditions such that wages and profits for food producers are below those in any other line of business, we must expect a continuing decreased production, which will eventually result in hunger.

I presume that the administration leaders will present a bill in Congress which will continue the food-control act into peace times, and I believe that if any such measure is passed it should be very carefully drawn, so that a commission of men will not have power to manipulate prices as their fancy may dictate.

Very truly, yours,

E. S. BRIGHAM,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont has vouched for the ability and integrity of the writer of this letter. The writer strongly arraigns the Food Administration, with which, as I understood the letter, he was for some time associated. In view of his charges, I think this letter should be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which is now investigating this subject; and I venture the suggestion that the committee should subpœna this gentleman as a witness, in order that he may give testimony as to the maladministration, if such there was, of the Food Administration and furnish information to aid in determining the important question which is now receiving attention at the hands of the committee.

I therefore move, if a motion is necessary, that the letter be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that course will be pursued.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CALDER in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gay	Nelson	Spencer
Bankhead	Hale	New	Sterling
Brandegee	Harris	Norris	Sutherland
Calder	Henderson	Nugent	Swanson
Capper	Hitchcock	Overman	Thomas
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Townsend
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Page	Trammell
Curtis	Kendrick	Phelan	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	King	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	Kirby	Poindexter	Warren
Fall	La Follette	Ransdell	Watson
Fernald	Lenroot	Sheppard	Wolcott
Fletcher	McKellar	Simmons
France	McNary	Smith, Ariz.
Frelinghuysen	Myers	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, about 12 years ago there was an agitation started in the United States to lease the public lands containing oil, gas, phosphate, sodium, and coal. There has not been a Congress since that time that bills have not been introduced in Congress for the purpose of leasing such public lands.

In the first place, Mr. President, I wish to say that I have been in the past opposed to a leasing system. I have been honest in my opposition to it, because of the fact that I thought that such a policy would not be the best way of developing an increased production of such minerals. I still have that feeling; but, notwithstanding that and knowing the situation as it exists in the United States to-day which has been brought so forcibly to the attention of the country by the recent war, I realize that there must be some change in the policy of our Government respecting public lands that has been in force for the past 12 years.

There are hundreds of millions of acres of the public domain withdrawn from entry of all kinds, and through those withdrawals new development of the natural resources in the western States has practically ceased, and something must be done to change present conditions. Various compromises have been suggested. Bills have been introduced incorporating in them not only the leasing system, but also a system of private ownership in connection with a leasing system. I never have been in favor of that double-headed system. I do not believe it ever would be a success. If we are to develop the public lands of the West, and if we are to begin the exploration and the discovery of these minerals so necessary for the prosperity of our country, legislation must be had, and had at an early date.

It was for that purpose that I introduced, on June 2, 1919, Senate bill 1269, to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain. I have noticed in the press numbers of references to the bill, all stating that it was a bill following the conference report on the leasing bill that was before this body at the last session of Congress. All such reports, Mr. President, are untrue. The conference report on the bill that was before the Senate at the last session of Congress not only had the leasing system incorporated in it, but it contained a provision that a certain percentage of oil lands obtained through a prospecting permit should be patented to the permittee, and in coal lands it was left discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior whether they were sold outright in case a satisfactory lease could not be obtained. Senate bill 2775 has no such provisions.

Senate bill 1269, introduced by myself, was a bill that was taken up by the Committee on Public Lands for consideration. Amendments were offered to that bill, and when finally completed by the adoption of a number of amendments it was ordered to be reintroduced, which was done by me on August 15, and that print now before the Senate shows the original bill with the amendments agreed to by the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CALDER in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. KING. I did not quite understand the statement of my colleague with respect to the bill first introduced and which became the basis of the bill under consideration. Was that bill introduced at this session?

Mr. SMOOT. It was introduced by me on June 2, 1919. I will say to the Senator that there were a number of amendments to that bill adopted by the committee, and they are incorporated in Senate bill 2775.

Mr. KING. As I recall, there was a measure agreed upon at the last session of Congress by the conferees after it had been held in conference for a number of months. I have had no opportunity to compare the present measure with the one which was then agreed upon. Is there any substantial difference between this bill and that one?

Mr. SMOOT. The difference is that Senate bill 2775 is purely a leasing measure, while——

Mr. KING. If my colleague will still pardon me, the bill agreed upon at the last session was a leasing bill; but there was a provision in it that title could be acquired to a portion of the lands that were covered by the permits or by the leases.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, and I thought I had made that plain in the statement I made a few moments ago. There is no title under the pending bill acquired to any portion of the public lands containing the numerals named in the bill. A lease only can be obtained.

Mr. KING. Would it interrupt my colleague if I should make a further inquiry?

Mr. SMOOT. Not in the least.

Mr. KING. I regret very much that this bill does not contain the provision to which reference has just been made. While I am opposed to this bill, and while I was opposed to the bill which was agreed upon at the last session, because I am absolutely opposed to the leasing system, the paternalism, the bureaucracy, the autocracy, the un-American system that the leasing system entails, nevertheless there was a provision in that bill that permitted the acquisition of title to a portion of the leased ground. Was there any good reason why that provision, which was a sort of a cure for some of the follies of the bill, and vindicated it somewhat, should not be included in this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. The only reasons I know of are that members of the committee thought that double-headed system of handling the public lands would prove a failure, and others believed that the public lands containing the minerals covered in this bill should never pass out of the control and ownership of the Government. As far as I am concerned, as I stated, I would prefer either one system or the other, and I will say to my colleague that that is the reason why I introduced the bill as a straight leasing proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. One very good reason, among many others, why title should not be conveyed is that with a full title conveyed there could be no supervision over the operation of the wells. A single well in a producing oil field, if not properly cared for so as to prevent water from getting into the oil sands, may destroy an entire field; and with full title granted there could be no way of preventing that kind of a catastrophe in a field.

Mr. KING. If my colleague will permit me, of course the argument the Senator has just made is an argument against the alienation of any oil lands by the Government.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. KING. And I do not think that argument is one which is sound; I do not think it is one which ought to prevail in determining the policy of the Government with respect to its public lands. As I said, I believe in the alienation of the public lands. I think they ought to be gotten out into the hands of individuals. Private ownership is the basis of the prosperity of the American people. The other system is alien to democratic institutions and to our form of Government. I think it is pernicious.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. In a letter dated July 29, 1919, from the Secretary of the Interior to me upon this subject the Secretary makes the following statement:

Senate bill 1269 is purely a leasing measure, containing no provision for patents except upon valid claims initiated prior to withdrawal and maintained in full compliance with existing law. Although I originally suggested the giving of a patent to prospectors of a part of the land upon which discoveries have been made, thinking it would be an incentive to exploration, I am now convinced, after mature consideration, that a straight leasing measure should be enacted, and I find that is the desire of people interested in mineral development generally.

Mr. President, I have lived with this legislation, as it were, for nearly 10 years. I am in close touch, not only with the men producing oil to-day, but I have been in close touch with the men who desire to go upon the public domain and prospect for oil and take their chances in discovering oil; but all known oil lands have been tied up by withdrawals for many years past and prospecting upon public lands has been limited indeed. I think now without a moment's hesitation I can truthfully state that there are at least 95 per cent of all the men who have been interested in this subject and who are bitterly opposed to the leasing system, as I was and as I am, are to-day saying that under the situation as it exists in the country the best thing to do is to try a leasing system, and the best plan is to prepare a bill along the line that will best meet the situation; and that is what I have tried to do.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator think it is the only thing to do in view of the later decisions of the Supreme Court?

Mr. SMOOT. I think so, Mr. President, and particularly with the power, I was going to say, of the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretaries of the different departments to prevent action upon any kind of bill that may be presented to Congress unless it provides a leasing system and to their liking.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. By the kindness of the Senator from Utah, I wish to say a word with reference to a remark made just a moment ago by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I desire to say to the Senator from Utah that there are quite a number of Senators here on both sides of the Chamber who sympathize very keenly with the feeling he has expressed, and they have repeatedly expressed themselves similarly during the course of a long struggle extending now over a period of six years to my knowledge, with this matter now before the Senate. But I desire to remind the Senator from Utah that there is growing up a sentiment, embryonic as yet I hope, that no disposition whatever should be made of the public lands containing these valuable mineral deposits, either by alienation or by lease; that they ought to be reserved altogether and be prospected and developed and operated by the Government, a plan of disposition which I apprehend would be even more objectionable to the Senator from Utah, if I have correctly estimated his views.

A great many of us have felt compelled, with reference to this legislation, to yield something of our own views concerning what ought to be done in order to secure some development of these lands, and I suggest to the Senator that by opposing this measure he is serving the purpose of those who do not want any legislation on this subject at all, in the hope that the sentiment of which I have spoken will grow and develop until it will be impossible to get legislation of this character or of the character which he thinks ought to be enacted.

Mr. SMOOT. In this connection I wish to say, if the reports that come to me are true, it would not surprise me to have this administration make, before this bill becomes a law, a recommendation that all coal upon the public domain and the operation of oil wells, including those that are in operation to-day and those that are yet to be discovered, be operated by the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Utah about section 1 of the bill. It is limited apparently to citizens of the United States, and the statement is made that no alien shall ever be permited to own any interest. Merely by way of suggestion, I should like to know from the Senator what effect he thinks that would have on our citizens in certain South American countries and in Mexico, and ought there not to be some limitation on that matter? I simply throw it out as a suggestion. I have not thought it out myself.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Tennessee will allow me to proceed, I assure him that that provision of the bill will be discussed at some length, and I prefer to discuss it later. I might state that I agree with the Senator that there is great apprehension expressed by Senators, and the committee had some misgiving as to just what effect that provision of the bill is going to have upon foreign countries. It is a question as to what is the best policy to pursue.

The committee decided ultimately that it is the best policy to follow the course as outlined in the last paragraph of section 1. But, as I said, that will be discussed later when we reach it.

Mr. President, there are withdrawn from all development 6,500,000 acres of the public domain supposed to contain oil, or, in other words, designated as oil lands. There are 2,700,000 acres of phosphate lands withdrawn in the same way. There are 3,500,000 acres of oil-shale lands that have already been classified. There are 43,700,000 acres of coal lands withdrawn, and of those 43,700,000 acres the Government up to the present time has classified as coal lands only 27,300,000 acres. That vast acreage of the public domain, all situated in the western part of our country, has been tied up for years, preventing any form of development. No development upon these lands can be made to-day. The time has come, in the opinion of the Committee on Public Lands, that legislation must be passed in order that these great undeveloped resources of our country shall be made use of by the American people.

When I was told 12 years ago that such withdrawals would be made, and that no development upon these lands should be allowed until the western Senators had agreed to a leasing system, I doubted at that time whether the program would be carried out. It has been carried out, and to-day we find that there is an actual scarcity of some of the minerals enumerated in the pending bill. I say now that unless there is a change in policy and the development of the lands for the minerals begins at an early time it will cost the American people millions of dollars and perhaps the loss of a great portion of their foreign commerce.

In all of the other leasing bills that have been reported favorably to the Senate by the Committee on Public Lands, the provisions of the bill applied to the Grand Canyon National Park and to the Mount Olympus National Monument. The committee thought that the park and the monument ought to be eliminated from the bill. There was opposition to such action, but the reason given that appealed to the committee was that the initiation of mineral claims had been used as a cloak to interfere with the full and free use of the park by the public. That has reference more particularly to the Grand Canyon National Park. Your committee thought that if coal indications were such in the Grand Canyon National Park as to justify prospecting for it, legislation could be passed covering that particular park, and so with the Mount Olympus Monument. It was for those reasons, Mr. President, that the committee decided to strike them out from Senate bill 1269.

There is a provision in section 1 of the bill referred to by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], found on page 2 of the bill, that has never yet appeared in any leasing bill offered in the Senate or reported out from a committee of the Senate or voted on by either House. That provision is as follows:

Provided, That no alien shall, by stock ownership or otherwise, own any interest in a lease acquired under the provisions of this act, except as hereinafter provided, and all certificates for stock hereafter issued in any corporation having such a lease shall specifically and clearly show this provision on the face thereof.

There are very few Senators in the Chamber at the present time, Mr. President, and I know a number of the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations are interested in this provision of the bill, so I would prefer now to pass it over until they are present and then discuss the question when there is a motion to strike it out or the question is brought up by one of the members of the Foreign Relations Committee. That will save a discussion of the provision twice.

I will say, however, in passing, that this proviso was not put in the bill without the most serious consideration. It was not incorporated in the measure without knowing the seriousness of it, and also without knowing that unless it is incorporated in the law the result will be serious to our own country and its control of the oil produced in it. All men know that the control of the oil in a country means a control of the commerce of that country.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NUGENT. If that be true, I should like to have the Senator explain why it is not possible for the Government itself to retain control of what remains of the oil lands of the country, in order that the oil of the Nation of the future may not be controlled by the representatives of other Governments.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not in favor of any such a system or policy. It may become necessary when the country can consume all the oil produced, but even then it would be unwise, in my opinion. I will say to the Senate that the provision under discussion ought to be made immediately, in order that the oils that are left remaining in the public lands owned by the United States should be controlled by the Government of the United States in case of necessity.

I take it for granted, Mr. President, that the greatest interest in this legislation revolves around the oil and gas lands of our country. In all the bills that have been reported in the past there has been a provision that would allow permits for the exploration for oil within a known geologic structure, and in most of the bills that have been reported heretofore the royalties have been the same whether the permittee developed the oil outside of a known geologic structure or within one. Your committee thought that that was unfair. The wildcatter, so called, is generally the man who goes out and discovers a new oil field. He is the one who, in many cases, goes outside of the known geologic structure, spends all the money he has and all he can borrow or beg in order to drive a well to a depth where he thinks oil will be found. He is the pioneer, as it were. Your committee thought the royalty that would be charged to him should be less than the royalty that would be charged to the man who under the original bill would be allowed and permitted to prospect for oil within a known geologic structure.

So, Mr. President, we decided to strike out from Senate bill 1269 all rights for permits within a known geologic structure, because within that structure, and they are generally small in area, the man who gets a permit knows that within such a structure oil is being produced, and if he wants to go within one of those structures he ought to take a lease and not a permit, and that is what the pending bill provides for, with a different rate of royalty.

In other words, if a person desires a permit to prospect for oil on 2,560 acres of the public domain outside of a geologic structure, he has the right to claim one-quarter of 2,560 acres, if he discovers oil, at a royalty of 5 per cent instead of 12½ per cent. Then he is given a preference right to the other three-fourths of that amount, if he so desires, at the regular royalty of not less than 12½ per cent or more than 25 per cent.

Unless there is some misunderstanding as to the provisions of the bill or some Senator desires to ask questions in reference to it, I am not going into a discussion of each section of the bill, but I do desire to call attention to section 35, on page 31, which reads:

> That all royalty accruing to the United States under any oil or gas lease or permit under this act on demand of the Secretary of the Interior shall be paid in oil or gas.

Then follows, on page 33, beginning with line 1 and ending with line 21, a provision that has for its object the granting to the Secretary of the Interior the power to sell the royalty oil collected within a district or within any number of districts to the highest bidder; but all of the bidding is to be in his hands and bids may be rejected or accepted. I desire briefly to say that the purpose of this portion of the bill is to assist the independent operation of refineries; in other words, small producers, within a known geologic structure or in a known oil or gas field may combine, if it is thought best, and bid for the royalty oil, and the Secretary of the Interior will have it within his power to dispose of all of the royalty oil, not only that from the individual producers of oil, but, for example, from the Mid-West Oil Co., the large producer in the Wyoming field, or from the large producer in any oil field who has sufficient capital to erect a refinery and has it in operation. The small operators, unless they can purchase sufficient oil, no matter whether they could get money to put up a refinery or not, would find themselves short of oil to successfully operate a refinery and make the operation profitable.

Under this provision of the bill the Secretary of the Interior can see that the small producer has a chance at all of the royalty oil of the district, thus insuring oil sufficient to operate an independent refinery. There will be opposition in bidding for the oil between the owners of the refinery operating to-day and a refinery that can be operated under the provisions of this bill. As the bill was reported to the Senate it read as follows:

> Upon granting any oil or gas lease under this act and at the beginning of each five-year period thereafter during said lease, the Secretary of the Interior shall offer for sale, upon notice and advertisement on sealed bids or at public auction, all royalty oil and gas accruing or reserved to the United States under such lease.

It was brought to the attention of the committee after they adopted that provision that it was unworkable. In fact, Mr. Mr. President, it is somewhat strange that members of the committee did not see that it was unworkable before they adopted the provision; but I will state that it was the last day we had the bill under consideration; and it was about 20 minutes to 12 o'clock, at which hour the Senate met, when we took up the question for consideration. We were all in favor of the principle and we did not study the effect of the provision as we should have done. So, on yesterday, I moved to strike out lines 1, 2, 3, and the first word in line 4, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

> The Secretary of the Interior shall have the right to offer for sale, for periods of not exceeding five years—

So as to read:

> The Secretary of the Interior shall have the right to offer for sale, for periods of not exceeding five years, upon notice and advertisement—

And so forth.

Mr. WARREN. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment is on page 32.

The original wording required the Secretary of the Interior to advertise for the sale of oil for a period of five years.

There is no product of which I am aware that has fluctuated in value as has oil, for within the last five years the price of oil per barrel has run all the way from 26 cents a barrel up to $2.25, which is the price to-day. It would be unjust to the Government, and it would also be unjust to the man who bid upon the oil to compel either to make a bid or accept one that would cover a period of five years.

Mr. President, with oil at $2.25 per barrel to-day, what set of men who undertook to build a refining plant would like to offer $2.25 a barrel for oil—the highest price known—and be compelled to pay that price during the whole term of five years? Of course it is apparent upon its face that no such provision could work satisfactorily either to the Government or to the individual.

On the other hand, if oil were 26 cents a barrel to-day, how unfair it would be to the Government of the United States to ask for bids, which perhaps, when received, might be 2 cents or 5 cents or 10 cents a barrel higher than the market price. It would be very unfair for the Government of the United States to tie up its product for the full period of five years. The amendment that has been made to the bill simply states that—

> The Secretary of the Interior shall have the right to offer for sale for periods of not exceeding five years.

I admit that this grants to the Secretary of the Interior the power to sell the oil for a period of 4 years 11 months and 29 days, but I do not believe there will ever be a Secretary of the Interior who will tie up the oil royalty which belongs to the Government of the United States for any such period.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENDRICK. Does the Senator from Utah not see in that amendment a weakening of the mandatory power to sell the royalty oil?

Mr. SMOOT. The only difference is that this amendment provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall have the right to offer it for sale, while the provision as drawn by Mr. Swartz says:

> The Secretary of the Interior shall offer for sale.

Mr. KENDRICK. Would the Senator not accept this as a substitute for the amendment already adopted:

> The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to sell for periods of not more than five years?

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is nearly what the original provision proposed to do. The original provision read:

> Upon granting any oil or gas lease under this act, and at the beginning of each five-year period thereafter during said lease—

The wording of the amendment suggested by the Senator is not exactly the same, because his proposed amendment says "not more than five years." The Senator does not change by his suggestion, however, the objections to the provision as it was originally reported to the Senate.

Mr. KENDRICK. The difficulty about the amendment which has been made, as I see it, is that it leaves it discretionary with the Secretary of the Interior as to whether or not he shall sell the royalty oil at all.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true; and not only that, but the original provision reads:

> Such advertisement and sale shall reserve to the Secretary of the Interior the right to reject all bids and the right to require redelivery of the actual oil or gas or any refined product thereof whenever within his judgment the interest of the United States demands.

That same provision remains in the bill under the amendment which was accepted yesterday.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator from Wyoming will permit me, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah what the purpose was in changing the language of the bill which required the Secretary of the Interior to sell the royalty oil, making the duty imperative upon him, to a provision that he shall have the right to sell, leaving in him a discretion as to whether he shall sell or not?

Mr. SMOOT. The committee thought after reading the criticism of Mr. Phelan, of the Shipping Board, that it ought to be left discretionary with the Secretary.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is what I want to know—if that is the purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will wait for just a moment, I will read what Mr. Phelan said. I have his statement here. Referring to lines 1 to 21—that is the whole of the provision—Mr. Phelan says:

> This part of section 35 is preposterous, and by no system of reasoning can it be made workable. Probably no commodity in the world fluctuates as much in price as crude petroleum. Taking the mid-continent field as an illustration, it appears that the price of crude petroleum has fluctuated during the past five years from 40 cents to $2.25 per barrel. The maximum price is being paid at present, and the average price has been less than $1.25 per barrel. In 1914–15, when the Cushing field was at its height, the market price of crude petroleum was 40 cents per barrel, while contracts were made as low as 26 cents. To expect the purchaser of oil to bind himself to pay a fixed price for crude oil for a five-year period is unthinkable, and to expect the producer to bind himself to sell oil for the same period of time at a contract price is just as unreasonable.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I thoroughly appreciate that, and therefore I can appreciate very well an amendment which would permit the Secretary to sell the royalty oil for a period of five years or for some less period, leaving it to him to fix the period, but that is not the change made.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand it is not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The change authorizes him to sell or not to sell as he sees fit. Let me inquire of the Senator if the Secretary concludes not to sell, what would he do with the oil?

Mr. SMOOT. No Secretary of the Interior will conclude not to sell unless it is to the advantage of the Government of the United States that he should do so. It might result in great disadvantage to the United States if the Secretary were compelled to sell. The Senator from Wyoming will admit that even in the Wyoming fields whenever there has been talk of beginning the construction and the operation of a refinery something has happened somehow which has prevented carrying out the project.

I think I know what did happen, and I think the Senator from Wyoming knows what happened, and I wish to say that the Secretary of the Interior, whoever he may be, ought to have the right to say whether he shall sell the oil produced as royalty or whether it shall be taken by the Government for its own use. Mind you, that is one thing which it is desired to bring about. Suppose the Navy wanted the royalty oil that is produced in the Wyoming district, and suppose the law said that the Secretary should sell it through bidding. In that case the Government would lose the royalty oil from that district.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will permit me, I am not speaking in criticism of the change made at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely want to understand the significance of it. It gives the Secretary the right to sell or not to sell as he sees fit.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So I inquire of the Senator if the Secretary of the Interior does not make provision for sale, what will he do with the oil? He can now offer to sell the royalty oil—and I think the bill ought to give him permission to sell the royalty oil for the entire period of five years or for a less period if he desires to do so, for a year, for instance, and leave it for disposition again at the end of the year—but suppose he concludes not to sell, has provision been made for the storage of the royalty oil?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Navy Department might want to store the oil, and the Secretary of the Interior is granted the right to demand the royalty shall be paid either in oil or money. The royalty as fixed is 12½ per cent of the value or of the oil. If the Government of the United States wants the oil, it will take the oil as provided in section 35, which reads in part:

> That all royalty accruing to the United States under any oil or gas lease or permit under this act on demand of the Secretary of the Interior shall be paid in oil or gas.

The Secretary of the Navy thinks there will be a time—and no doubt there will be—and the Shipping Board particularly believes that the time is now at hand when the Secretary of the Interior ought to say, "I do not want the money; I want the oil." In that event, of course, the Government would take the oil and provide storage for it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am in full accord with that idea.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the amendment suggested by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] the Secretary will be compelled to sell the oil. We do not want that; we want him to have the privilege of selling or of keeping the oil.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course I am in entire accord with that idea, but what troubled me was that the language does not seem to meet the case. It seems to me it should provide that he shall have the right to sell the royalty oil for a period of five years or less than five years, in his discretion, and then it should provide what disposition should be made of the royalty oil in case he concludes not to sell it.

Mr. SMOOT. It will all be sold, Mr. President, unless the Government wishes to store it, and the Government itself will make provision for the storage—there is no doubt about that—if they wish to retain the oil.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Utah that I understand very well the conditions which have prevailed in my State, to which he has referred. The experience we have had there is what prompts me now to seek to place in this bill such a provision as will compel action along different lines from those which have been followed in the past. I am perfectly willing to see incorporated in the bill a limitation or restriction that, in case the oil is not required by the United States Government, it shall be sold from time to time in periods not to exceed five years.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the situation in Wyoming after this bill goes into operation will be quite different than it ever has been in the past. The Government will take at least 12½ per cent, and it would not surprise me at all if it took 20 per cent, of the oil produced in the whole State, and it has the disposition of that oil. Now, I have no doubt that if the independent producers of Wyoming want to erect a refinery, the Secretary of the Interior—I do not care who he may be—would prefer to sell the royalty oil to them rather than to anybody else, and that would encourage them at least to the extent that they would have a reasonable chance of securing the oil that is paid as royalty to the Government of the United States within the district.

Mr. KENDRICK. Assuming that that is so, I see no reason why we should not provide in the bill that he shall follow the course that we clearly intend him to take.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, if we make it that he shall sell it, then suppose the Government wanted to take the oil and ship it out of Wyoming?

Mr. KENDRICK. As I said a moment ago, I am perfectly willing to leave that provision.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the whole provision covers it, because, as the Senator will see if he will read the whole of the provision, I think it is left in the discretion of the Secretary.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have read it carefully, Mr. President, and I will say this about it: There has been a really serious condition in my State for many years. Our oil has been bringing one-half the price that has obtained in other sections of the country. The plan of this amendemnt—to sell this royalty oil—is clearly to correct that condition. I agree to the necessary change in so far as a limitation of time is concerned; but we ought not to leave in the law any obscure language that would leave the duty of the Secretary of the Interior in doubt.

Mr. SMOOT. That is why I do not want to leave it. I want it distinctly understood that the Secretary of the Interior shall have the discretion as to whether it shall be sold, or wheher it shall be paid in oil and the Government retain that oil. We can not do otherwise than that.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will bear with me just a moment, this question was brought to the attention of the committee by Mr. Swartz, the representative of the independent oil producers of Wyoming. As it was reported to the Senate, it was as agreed to by Mr. Swartz; but I need not go over the same ground again, because it is unworkable in its original form. It did say there that "the Secretary of the Interior shall offer for sale," but it also continued by giving him the discretionary power as to whether he would accept the bid or reject it. All we say now is this: Instead of compelling him to sell all of the oil for a five-year period, because it was to be sold in five-year periods, we simply say: "The Secretary of the Interior shall have the right to offer for sale, for periods of not exceeding five years," and it does not change a word in the balance of the provision.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if my colleague will yield——

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that the point for which the committee and the chairman of the committee are contending—namely, that there ought to be discretion, because if you make it mandatory it might preclude the disposition of the oil to the Government—is not quite sound. If the Government desires to purchase—that is, the Navy Department or the Shipping Board—for governmental use, the sale could be effectuated just the same. It is a question of bookkeeping. One department of the Government sells to another agency or department of the Government; and if there is a provision that the Secretary shall sell, he may sell to the Navy Department; he may sell to the Government; he may sell upon a sliding scale; the sale may be for five years, graduated upon the market price—5 per cent below, or 1 per cent below, or the market price—and in that way the Government could get it, and it would be a sale. So that if the contention of the Senator is that if you have this mandatory provision in the bill it will inhibit the Government from purchasing it, it does not seem to me that that is quite correct.

Mr. SMOOT. I think my colleague has not really thought how that would be brought about. The Government of the United States under the law has to ask for bids for everything that it purchases, and each bidder has to submit his bids; and the lowest bid, if it is a reliable party, is generally taken. I do not see how they can go to work under this provision and have the Government offer to sell the Government so much oil. Not only that, but this oil when it is produced has to be handled quickly or else there has to be a storage capacity for it.

Take the production, for instance, of last month in the United States. The production in the month of June was 31,239,000 barrels. There was a daily production of 1,041,300 barrels. Now, there has to be some way of handling it, and handling it quickly. You can not stop its flow and you have to take the oil as it comes and handle it as best you can. I think the provision that we have here now will take care of the Wyoming situation and any other great oil field that may be developed on the public lands of the United States.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me for just a moment, I appreciate the statute to which the Senator refers, and of course if the policy I suggested were carried out there would have to be a proper amendment permitting the purchase by some agency of the Government other than by advertising or under the general advertising provisions of the statute, but I am very much averse to the pursuit of any policy that will entail upon the Interior Department the obligation or the duty or the necessity of erecting immense storage reservoirs for the conservation of the oil. The cost will be enormous—indeed, perhaps prohibitive. I think the Secretary ought to have discretion to sell, but there ought to be, perhaps, some limitation concerning the exercise of that discretion.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that never will happen with any Secretary of the Initerior, unless it becomes absolutely necessary in order to store the oil for our Navy or the shipping that we may operate in the future.

Mr. KING. I would prefer that the Navy Department or the Shipping Board provide the storage rather than the Interior Department.

Mr. SMOOT. That will be taken care of, of course, by the Secretary of the Interior. If the Navy Department makes a demand upon the Secretary of the Interior for this oil there is not any question but that the Secretary of the Interior will deliver it and at the place that the Secretary of the Navy may designate, and the Secretary of the Navy will have to provide storage capacity for it.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I ask the Senator's pardon for interrupting him again.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. KENDRICK. I want to say that I am apprehensive for an entirely different reason than that expressed by the Senator from Utah. We have had a condition in our State, which has already been referred to, in regard to the way the refining has been done, and I am apprehensive lest this oil will continue to pass into the hands of refineries without being sold to the highest bidder.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, well, this bill provides that it shall be sold to the highest bidder.

Mr. KENDRICK. I am concerned to see that neither the Secretary nor any one else in authority has any discretion as to that.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that this bill provides that the oil shall be sold to the highest bidder. We could not get through Congress in a thousand years a law saying that the Secretary of the Interior should sell it to John Smith or any particular person. The only form in which we could ever get it through Congress is that it should be sold to the highest bidder, and the independent refiners will have to take their chances on that; but it does give them a chance of getting the oil in order to run an independent refinery.

Mr. KENDRICK. But, as I read the bill, it grants authority to the Secretary of the Interior to sell; it gives him the right to sell, but does not provide that he shall sell. Therein lies the only difference between the Senator from Utah and myself.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I understand that, and I have tried in my simple way of speaking to indicate that I think the Secretary ought to be given that discretion. I think if we compel him to sell it, the oil may be forced upon the market at a time when it would be against the interests of the Government of the United States to sell it. It would either be that way, or else they would have to provide some method of storage. Now, we are not sure that these independent people will build refineries. We can not say as to that. I hope they will, and I will say to the Senator now that this provision never would be in this bill at all if it were not with the hope that the independent refiners will build a plant there and refine their own oil.

Mr. KENDRICK. There is no doubt that that was the spirit in which it was put in.

I will ask the Senator from Utah whether he expects to conclude the consideration of this bill this afternoon?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; I do not think it can pass this evening. I have no intention of forcing it through this evening. I should like to get as far along with the consideration of the bill as possible; but if the Senator desires to have it go over until to-morrow, and consider that question again, I am perfectly willing that it should. I do want to give notice, however, that unless there is some good reason to the contrary, I should like to see the bill passed to-morrow. I do not think there are very many Senators who desire to speak upon it.

I want to say that I never expected to get out of the Public Lands Committee, with a unanimous report, a leasing bill. I never expected to vote, as a member of that committee, for a straight leasing bill with the provisions that are in this bill; but I have stated why I did so, and I am perfectly willing to rest upon that statement.

In order that it may hasten the passage of the bill I am going to say nothing more about its provisions unless somebody desires to ask some question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before the Senator quits this particular provision which has been the subject of consideration, I should like to make a few suggestions in the hope that the idea we all entertain may be clearly expressed in it. I suppose probably the matter has had serious consideration from the committee; but I venture the opinion that the last proviso at the end of section 35, on page 32, is of the most questionable nature.

Touching this matter of the disposition of the royalty oil, evidently the idea is that the Secretary of the Interior ought to have the right to offer the royalty oil for sale, and for sale for periods of five years or less than five years, as in his discretion may seem wise; that he ought to have liberty in that direction; likewise, Mr. President, that he ought to have the right in his discretion not to sell the royalty oil at all, but to keep it for the use of the United States. With some circumlocution the idea might be expressed more briefly; but that, I think, is the idea that is in the minds of the framers of the legislation, and it meets my entire approval. I am very sure, however, that the language suggested here by way of amendment does not answer that purpose at all.

I suggest, for the consideration of the chairman of the committee, that he take out in line 2 the language "at the beginning of each five-year period," and insert in lieu thereof "from time to time," and after the word "shall" in line 3 insert "except whenever in his judgment it is desirable to retain the same for the use of the United States," so that it would read—

> Upon granting any oil or gas lease under this act and from time to time thereafter during said lease, the Secretary of the Interior shall, except whenever in his judgment it is desirable to retain the same for the use of the United States, offer for sale, upon notice and advertisement—

And so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will submit that amendment, I shall be very glad to think it over during the evening.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be glad to do that. If the Senator will give attention now to the concluding proviso, that section provides, as will be noticed——

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield at that point? Has the Senator from Montana the amendment before him that was adopted yesterday?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator was reading, it seemed to me, from the bill as it was reported.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did read from the bill as reported, but I have in mind the amendment that was offered yesterday. However, I was endeavoring to convey to the Senate the idea that the amendment which was offered yesterday does not, at least clearly, express the idea that apparently everyone has in mind.

Section 35 provides very properly that the Secretary should offer the royalty oil for sale unless in his judgment and discretion it seemed to be desirable to keep it for the use of the United States, and very appropriate provisions are put in that he may reject any and all bids, and so on. But now comes the provision as follows:

Provided, however, That advertisement or sale as herein required may be dispensed with in specific cases upon a finding by the Secretary of the Interior that such course is in the interest of the public good.

In other words, whenever the Secretary of the Interior finds that it is in the interest of the public good, he does not need to advertise at all. The representative of the Standard Oil Co. may go down to the office of the Secretary of the Interior, and they will have a private confab about it, and the Secretary of the Interior will reach the conclusion that it is for the public good to make a private arrangement with the representatives of the Standard Oil Co. by which they would take this royalty oil. I am sure the committee did not intend to leave open opportunities of that character.

I have been advised by a gentleman of my neighboring State of Wyoming, in whom I have the very greatest confidence, that the provision was inserted at his suggestion and for a very commendable purpose. He said he had in mind that there would be some small independent refiners or a group of producers who would establish a refinery, and adjacent to their property there would be other property that would be leased by the Government of the United States, and they would thus be able, perhaps, to make an arrangement with the Secretary of the Interior by which they could get the royalty oil which, together with their own, would enable them to carry on a small refining establishment. Of course, that is a very good purpose to be subserved, but I submit that it is too dangerous a power to put in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of the enormous quantity of royalty oil, which as we hope will come into his hands, without even giving competitors an opportunity to bid on it, not even advertising it for sale. I think that the provision ought to come out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair make inquiry of the Senator from Utah as to the wording of the bill in the proviso to which the Senator from Montana just called attention. Did the committee intend to report it out to read as it does in lines 18 and 19, page 32, "advertisement or sale"? Is it "or" or "for"?

Mr. SMOOT. It should be "for."

I want to say at this point, Mr. President, that I do not want to unduly criticize the Government Printing Office for the many typographical errors in the bill. I introduced the bill one morning, and I told the Government Printing Office that I wanted it back here in half an hour, as I was instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to make a report from that committee upon the bill that day. Really, I want to apologize. This is not the only error; there are quite a number of them in the bill; but it is perhaps my fault, because I gave the Public Printer only a half hour to get the bill from the press to the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The word "or," as suggested by the Chair should be "for"?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course that makes no difference in my argument. The proviso authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, practically in his discretion, to dispense with advertisement altogether.

Mr. SMOOT. What the Senator from Montana says is absolutely correct. All the apprehension that he has about this provision could be realized; but, Mr. President, I think it would be better to be very frank in this matter and simply say why this was done. That is the only way I know of discussing the question.

There might be a case like this: A lease to a citizen of a well that was producing, say, after three months or six months not to exceed five barrels a day. The royalty on that at not more than 12½ per cent would be so small that if it were all put together for five months it would amount to such a small quantity of oil that it would hardly be just for him to go to the expense of advertising, and so forth. That is one instance.

Let me state another. The provision is written with the distinct understanding that it is for the advantage of the small producers in an oil field who might desire to construct a refinery. They felt that if they undertook to erect a refinery and the present refiners decided that they would bid on the oil more than it was actually worth in order to prevent these individuals from receiving the necessary oil to run or operate their refinery, they could do it. This simply says to the Secretary of the Interior that if such a condition arises you need not advertise, but you know what the value of this oil is and you may sell it to those individuals and let them operate that refinery without advertising. I want to say frankly to the Senator that is what the people of Wyoming had in mind and that is what the committee had in mind when they allowed that provision to go in. Every word the Senator from Montana says is true. Legislation of that kind is not satisfactory legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me suggest to the Senator from Utah that we see if we can not meet the expectations of these people, so far as they are just, without exposing the administration of the bill to the worst kind of scandals and the Government of the United States to the most egregious frauds. The reason first——

Mr. SMOOT. May I say to the Senator that I would like very much if he would, this afternoon or evening some time, draw up what he thinks would be a proper provision to cover as nearly as possible the case as I have outlined it. There is no pride in the wording of the bill on the part of any member of the committee. What they want to do, now that they have made up their minds to a leasing bill, is to get the best measure possible and to hamper the development of the western country just as little as possible.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will be very glad to be helpful in any way I can.

I desire to suggest in this connection that the reason assigned in the first place, that it would be expensive and perhaps unprofitable to advertise where the production was small, could be overcome by a provision that in all cases where the production does not exceed five barrels per day advertisement may be dispensed with. But with respect to the second suggestion, I think it will not be necessary for me to do anything because the bill, as it reads, provides that—

In cases where no satisfactory bid is received or where the accepted bidder fails to complete the purchase, the Secretary of the Interior within his discretion may readvertise such royalty for sale or sell at private sale.

And so forth.

So the Secretary of the Interior becomes the absolute judge as to whether the bid is satisfactory. I apprehend that that would include the bidder, and if he finds the bidder to be one who has a practical monopoly in the field, or if it becomes desirable to shut out a large producer and give an opportunity to the lesser bidders he could reject the one bid and thus give the preference which it is proposed to give by the proviso.

Mr. LENROOT. What would the Senator suggest should be done in the case of a discovery of a very large production where the Secretary does not care to take the oil? Under the provisions of the bill without the proviso he would not be permitted to sell without advertisement. It would be very essential that he should be permitted to sell at private sale until advertisement can be had and bids received.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly provision should be made for that.

Mr. LENROOT. Without the proviso he would not have that right under the terms of the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That, it seems to me, is the case under the bill as it stands.

Mr. LENROOT. No; the proviso would permit him to sell in that kind of a case.

Mr. SMOOT. The balance of the provision requires advertisement, but after advertisement, then, of course, he can sell at private sale.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not have any idea that the proviso referred to the interim between the bringing in of the well and the completion of the advertisement.

Mr. LENROOT. It covers that kind of a case.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly, that should be taken care of.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think this is all I have to say in relation to the bill at the present time.

On the conclusion of Mr. SMOOT's speech,

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether there is any other Senator who desires to speak upon the bill to-night or not. Does the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] desire to speak on the bill to-night?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not. I do not intend to speak on the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. If there is no other Senator who desires to speak on the bill at this time, I shall move an adjournment.

INTERNATIONAL BANKING SITUATION.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to have placed in the RECORD a letter which I wrote to the President on July 16 and also one which I wrote August 18 relative to the international banking situation.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JULY 16, 1919.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Europe needs supplies from the United States to restore the productive powers of Europe to prewar conditions, to enable Europe to pay its debts to America, to stop the growing discontent of unemployed men, and to check the growth of Bolshevism.

America has the supplies abundantly available.

Europe requires credit to buy these things.

The Secretary of the Treasury does not approve the extension of further credits by the United States Government to cover European purchases. I believe that the American people would approve the extension of these credits properly safeguarded if it were explained to them—that the credits would open a way to market their goods at satisfactory prices.

I understand that Holland, for instance, is now extending governmental credits to France for such peace purposes; that Sweden is also doing the same thing; and that some of the South American Republics have the same matter under advisement. The urgency is great, and this policy would be of benefit to both buyer and seller.

We have an investing public in America, however, well suited to extend these credits to Europe by buying European securities. There is needed a mechanism qualified to pass upon the validity of European securities offered for sale to the investing public. These securities consist of "promises to pay" of private merchants, of syndicates, of underwriting banks, and of bonds of European municipalities and nations and of combinations of such securities.

Against these securities, properly selected, debentures could be issued by American corporations and sold to the American investing public on a 6 per cent basis, provided the Government of the United States would lend its good offices in granting a suitable charter or charters to such institutions, with governmental supervision, the charter rights to be exercised under governmental patronage and favor.

Unless immediate steps are taken to accomplish these results, I fear a serious business reaction will take place in the United States by cutting off a large part of our foreign market for our surplus products, throwing these products back on the United States and causing a very serious recession of prices due to overproduction. I agree that prices should come down, but the reduction should be by the elimination of excess profits artificially placed upon goods, and they should not come down by cutting down the wages paid to labor. There is a natural increase in prices in the United States due to the expansion of our currency by excess gold imports and by the development of Federal reserve notes against commodities which have taken the place of gold as a basis of note issue.

With a view to providing a mechanism for accomplishing these purposes, I introduced on February 20, 1918, a bill (S. 3928) to establish a Federal reserve foreign bank. (Copy inclosed.)

You referred this bill to the Comptroller of the Currency for a report and he made you a favorable report, but you took no action upon it, as far as I know, and I was unable to get the support of the Treasury Department for the bill, and it died with the Sixty-fifth Congress, to my great regret.

I drew up a bill some months ago providing for the organization of a large corporation, with a billion dollars of capital, to handle these European securities, issue debenture bonds, and provide the means of marketing European securities in America with the investing public, a copy of which I enclose.

The virtue of this bill consisted in the Government of the United States having a very substantial interest in it, and therefore being in a position, from the standpoint of the public, to protect the interests of the public as well as the interest of the stockholders, who might otherwise deal too largely from a selfish standpoint.

The New York banks dealing in foreign exchange have been hostile to both of the above bills, since they regard such measures as having a tendency to deprive them of the monopoly of foreign exchange and to deprive them of the opportunity of speculating in foreign exchange. I am opposed to their speculation to the injury of our industries and commerce, and I allege that they have made millions out of speculation in foreign exchange, to the disadvantage of American commerce and to the disadvantage of the American producers and the American consumers alike. I allege their interest is a private interest, and that they are not concerned to deal with the matter from the public standpoint. I do not intend this comment as any reproach to them in their natural attitude to deal with the subject matter from the standpoint of their private interest. I merely call your attention to it and to what I assume should be our attitude as public servants to protect the public against private monopolies in international exchange.

Senator EDGE introduced on July 15, 1919, Senate bill 2472, authorizing the organization of corporations to deal in foreign banking, a copy of which is inclosed, and which I understand meets the views of the Federal Reserve Board and of the Secretary of the Treasury. I believe the banks dealing in international exchange would make no objection to this latter bill, for the reason that it simply gives a Federal charter to corporations to engage in international banking. While I should greatly prefer a Federal reserve foreign bank that would be a medium through which all American banks could function with assurance of equitable treatment, it will probably be better to pass Senate bill 2472 rather than take no action at all, for at least it would expand the facilities in the international banking field, and the Federal reserve foreign bank might be developed later. Indeed, I think under your authority the Federal Reserve Board could establish a division handling international exchange in the public interest rather than for private interests to do so, and which would function as a Federal reserve foreign bank without the name, and this might be acceptable to the Federal Reserve Board.

The Federal reserve act authorizes the Federal reserve banks to transact international banking business and authorizes the Federal Reserve Board to require them to do this, so that you have the power now to direct the Federal reserve banks to immediately open up foreign branches and transact foreign business for the protection of the public. If you do not support a Federal reserve foreign bank, then I appeal to you to compel the Federal reserve banks to open up foreign branches and transact the business which the Federal reserve act contemplates and in respect to which they have not discharged their full functions.

I venture to remind you that under the act of June 15, 1917, known as the espionage act, you directed the Secretary of the Treasury to administer the regulations relative to the export of coin, bullion, and currency by Executive order of September 7, 1917, and under the act known as "Trading with the enemy act," by Executive order of October 12, 1917, you further vested in the Secretary of the Treasury the authority to supervise the foreign-exchange operations, etc.

You have recently, by proper orders, vacated this machinery, but you have not canceled the original Executive orders. I respectfully suggest that these Executive orders should be canceled so as to leave the field open for the supervision and action of the Federal Reserve Board to the extent of their existing powers under the Federal reserve act in relation to foreign-exchange business free from a possible technical complication.

Mr. President, the suggestions of this letter would be valueless if I had no concrete proposal to make.

I make a concrete proposal.

I request that you submit this entire subject matter to the Secretary of the Treasury, to the Federal Reserve Board, and to the Secretary of Commerce, and require of each of them an immediate written report upon these several bills, and direct them to submit recommendations as to what shall be done to protect the foreign commerce of the United States and stabilize international exchange, with a view to submitting such reports and recommendations to Congress.

Very respectfully, ——— ———.

AUGUST 18, 1919.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I take the liberty of submitting herewith a memorandum on the present condition of our foreign exchange and the need for administrative and legislative action thereon.

Last Saturday the exchange rates went down to the following low points, lower than ever before in the history of the world:

Sterling, $4.26; premium, 60 cents per pound.
Francs, $7.86; premium, 2.68 francs per dollar.
Lire, $9.26; premium, 4.08 lire per dollar.

This means that on a credit to English buyers of American goods at 60 cents a pound our bankers are charging a premium of $140,000 on $1,000,000.

That they are charging a premium of $519,000 on $1,000,000 credit to French buyers of American goods, and $768,000 premium for $1,000,000 credit to Italian buyers of American goods, no part of which premium reaches American producers. The same bankers at one time during the war charged American importers for pesetas necessary to pay for importations from Spain, when pesetas went up to 30 cents, $502,000 premium per $1,000,000 of credit. These transactions go into hundreds of millions of dollars. The Spanish credits, of course, have now come below par, and the banks extending the credits made this profit, outside of interest and commissions. The Spanish banks got rich out of this harvest, and the American banks that used their credits in Spain have profited in the same way at the expense of the consumers in the United States. This was one of the factors which added to the high cost of living. These banks are now selling exchange short in New York on a very large scale, which means that they are selling sterling, francs, and lire (which they have not) with the expectation of buying them back in the future at a lower price, making good their contracts and profiting thereby. They have an interest, therefore, in depressing the price of sterling, francs, and lire, against the public interest and to the great harm of the consumers of Great Britain, France, and Italy, who were our allies in the Great War, faithful to death.

In like manner this is operating against our exporters and against the producers of America by interfering with their reasonable foreign market and exercising a depressing effect upon the values which they should receive for their goods and making their business unstable and extra hazardous.

These banks have no public function to serve from their point of view. They are engaged purely in dealing with exchange as a commodity and speculating on it. If you would instruct the governor of the Federal Reserve Board to make a confidential inquiry of the trust companies and the Comptroller of the Currency to make a like inquiry into the national banks engaged in this business, I am sure that you would find most abundant verification of the fact.

Such usury and profiteering is full of disastrous consequences and will inevitably react on the United States. You advised Congress wisely in your recent message on this subject, but it will take the full power of your administration and the cooperation of Congress to correct this condition.

I want to emphasize upon your attention that these dollars are being sold by somebody and that somebody is making these usurious profits to the injury of our national commerce going abroad.

On July 16, 1919, a month ago, I wrote you with regard to this, and I inclose a copy of that letter, together with the three bills therein referred to, the so-called Edge bill (S. 2472), the foreign finance corporation bill (S. 2590), the bill to establish a Federal reserve foreign bank (S. 2767), and the amendment to the War Finance Corporation (S. J. Res. 88). (Copies inclosed.)

The volume of these credits is so large that there is no danger whatever of overdoing the matter. The Federal reserve foreign bank ought to be established as a permanency. The amendment to the War Finance Corporation bill and the Edge bill will serve a present purpose, and both are approved by the Federal Reserve Board and, I believe, by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The foreign finance corporation bill (S. 2590) is opposed by the New York banks, and I do not believe can be passed. The other bills can be passed with your active support.

Very cordially and faithfully, yours,

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I submit these letters because they explain in a compact form certain facts and principles which I wish the Senate to have before it, so that, as far as I can, I may contribute to the proper protection of our foreign commerce and prevent the serious consequences which may ensue if the Congress and the executive department fail to act.

To-day's papers announce the still further depreciation of exchange.

Those buying sterling, francs, and lire have no competition. The foreign exchange is controlled by a close monopoly of interests, which is moved alone by profits in handling foreign bills as a commodity under no governmental control or supervision of any kind. The end will be injurious to our commerce and industries.

Mr. President, it is impossible for me to doubt the solvency of Great Britain or France or Italy. These great nations have shown their great powers of production and recuperation in the past. With the increased use of machinery, of organization, of modern methods, tremendously stimulated by the war, and with the very great addition of women in the industrial life of these nations, there should be no difficulty on the part of these countries in meeting every obligation. Their history in the past has always been honorable.

It should be remembered that in the case of France, for example, while issuing a large volume of bonds, these bonds, comprising a national obligation, are held by her own citizens almost exclusively, so that the national debit is offset by the citizen credit, and neither adds to nor takes from the productive power of the people of France.

The destruction of property by the war in France occurred on about 5 per cent of the lands of France, and amounted to a destruction equal to about 40 per cent of the values on this limited area, a total of about 2 per cent of the values of France, which is offset by the tremendous expenditures of the nations of the world on French soil, such as the improvement of the harbors of France by the United States, the building of railroads, the furnishing of machinery, and the construction of warehouses. The warehouses built by the United States in France, if put end to end, would make a warehouse over 400 miles long. The inventive genius of the world has been greatly stimulated by war. The French people are a thrifty people. They are small landowners and holders. The distribution of the lands of France is so great that it comprises a basis of great stability economically, industrially, and politically.

It is to be assumed that France will correct the financial blunders made during the war by inflating the currency instead of selling bonds. France must retire her inflated currency by putting on a drive to sell French bonds to the French people and to sell French bonds to the people of the world. The French statesmen should make a plain statement of account, showing that France can and will meet her obligations to the world, and the French Government should have the resolution to require those who have profited by the war to contribute as substantially as Great Britain and the United States did through excess-profits taxes and progressive income and inheritance taxes. Undoubtedly France has the intelligence to do this; and now that the terrible excitement and confusion of war has passed, the world may and will expect France to live up to the high ideals which the past has demonstrated.

The same thing is true of Italy, and, of course, is still more obvious in the case of Great Britain. Nobody can doubt the solvency of Great Britain, and yet the pound sterling is selling at a discount in the United States of 14 per cent, the French franc at a discount of 55 per cent, and the Italian lire at a discount of 85 per cent. I should rather have said that the American dollar was selling at a premium of 15 per cent in Great Britain, 55 per cent in France, and 85 per cent in Italy. But the people of the United States can afford to extend credit to the merchants of Great Britain, France, and Italy at a fair rate. The credit of these merchants, backed by the British, French, and Italian banks, and backed in addition by the Government bonds of Great Britain, of France, and of Italy, comprises as sound a security as the world can afford and is entitled to credit at a reasonable rate. To charge a premium of 15 per cent or 55 per cent or 85 per cent in dealing with these nations is contrary to sound moral and ethical principles and contrary to sound banking principles.

The lack of justification is shown by our own experience with Spain, where the Spanish bankers sold pesetas at 30 cents, or at a premium so great that 66 cents of gold in Spain would buy a dollar of gold in New York. Spain was selling our merchants credit at a premium of 55 per cent, which our consumers paid plus a merchants' profit, and olive oil went to $8 a gallon. No one could justify this on the ground that the United States was not solvent, yet it actually occurred. Now the peseta is down below par, which, of course, has taken place since Spain ceased to ship commodities to the world in excess of what the world shipped to Spain.

The best way in which to balance these exchanges and put the international credit system on a sound foundation is to extend credits on a fair basis to counterbalance the excess of commodity shipments which is taking place from the United States to Europe and to the world. It is essential, to maintain our own markets, that we do this. A failure to do this has resulted in breaking down international exchange and has resulted in causing a powerful reaction in the stock market. It will result in lowering the price of commodities which are being shipped from the United States to Europe, and with the reaction in prices we may have a serious industrial reaction in the United States.

These matters require action by Congress and by the Executive Department in order to have the prosperity of the United States continue unabated. All patriotic men should cooperate to this end, and will do so if they understand the problem.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PHELAN. Do I understand from the Senator in charge of the bill, which is the unfinished business, that there is to be no prolonged discussion of the bill to-morrow?

Mr. SMOOT. Not that I know of, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. PHELAN. There are no speeches announced on any subject for to-morrow?

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is to speak to-morrow, but I have reference to the oil-leasing bill.

Mr. PHELAN. I was wondering why the Senator did not proceed with the bill at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say frankly to the Senator that there are one or two Senators who desire to speak on the bill who do not want to proceed to-night, but they will be ready to speak to-morrow.

Mr. PHELAN. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 22, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate August 21, 1919.

REGISTER OF THE LAND OFFICE.

Frank A. Boyle to be register of the land office, Juneau, Alaska.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER COMMISSION.

Robert L. Faris, member Mississippi River Commission.

COLLECTORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Leon O. Tebbetts to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Maine.

George F. O'Shaunessy to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Rhode Island.

David C. Dunbar to be collector of internal revenue for the district of Utah.

POSTMASTERS.

FLORIDA.

Louis J. Cowan, Daytona.
Gustavus M. Rhoden, Macclenny.

MONTANA.

Lucy B. Cullen, Wibaux.

PORTO RICO.

Nicolas Ortiz Lebron, Aibonito.
Jose E. Guenard, Mayaguez.
Teodoro M. Lopez, Vega Baja.
L. Castro Gelpi, Vieques.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 21, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Sometimes, dear Lord, in our quest for the transients, we overlook the eternal values of life, and dire consequences follow as a natural sequence.

Eternal vigilance, it has been said, is the price of liberty, and history confirms it.

If the wise counsels of the Mohonk Conferences had been heeded 20 years ago we would have been spared the terrible war through which we have just passed and the dire consequences to life and property which followed in its wake.

Give us the courage of our convictions and lead us onward and upward to the eternal values—life, liberty, truth, justice, righteousness. In His name. Amen.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have more Members present, and I make the point of order——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that when the gentleman makes a point of no quorum he should so state it and not make any other statement. If the gentleman wishes to make a point of no quorum, he should do so.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw it until the Journal is read.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House for a change of reference of the bill H. R. 8423, providing additional compensation to certain employees of the Post Office Department for overtime service, and also the bill H. R. 8424, for increased compensation for postal employees during the current fiscal year, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, what is it the gentleman wants?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KELLER] asks unanimous consent for change of reference of a bill relating to the salaries of post-office employees from the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. KELLER. Two bills, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Two bills. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

TUNGSTEN ORES.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4437.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4437.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What became of the Igoe resolution? Was that voted on?

The SPEAKER. That was passed day before yesterday. The question is on the House resolving itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4437, with Mr. GOOD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4437) to provide revenue for the Government and to promote the production of tungsten ores and manufactures thereof in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate upon this bill has been concluded, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the day following the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the articles named herein, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or into any of its possessions, the rates of duties which are herein prescribed, namely:

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, on day before yesterday, before my time expired——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think we should have a quorum present, and I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and five Members are present, a quorum. The gentleman from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, in discussing the bill day before yesterday, I stated that there was a monopoly in this country on tungsten ore and ferrotungsten. That has not been denied, and can not be denied. I stated that one corporation in California was producing over one-third of the tungsten ore and that that corporation and three other corporations produced over 75 per cent of the tungsten ore that is produced in this country. That has not been denied and can not be denied. I stated that this bill if passed would take at least $5,000,000 annually out of the pockets of the people and put it into the pockets of these four corporations. I stated that this bill if passed would absolutely fix this monopoly in this country and would finally give it a monopoly of all of the production. That has not been denied, and can not be denied. I stated that this bill was conceived, prepared, and written by the beneficiaries of the tariff proposed in the bill. That has not been denied, and it can not be denied. I stated that the rates which the beneficiaries of the tariff demanded of the Ways and Means Committee have been put into this bill without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." That has not been denied, and it can not be denied. I stated that this bill if passed would at once give four firms of importers in New York who now have, according to the evidence, 4,500 tons of imported ore stored there, $2,700,000 as a clear bonus by enhancing the value of such ore that amount, and would give the producers here, who have stored 1,500 tons, a clear bonus of $900,000 by advancing their price to that extent, or a total gift to those who are hoarding these 6,000 tons of ore of $3,600,000. That was denied by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who simply brushed it aside by saying, "That is not so," without proposing a scintilla of evidence to support his denial. The evidence in the hearing, which the committee has before it, shows exactly what I stated, and I state it now, and it can not be denied.

I stated that the rate in this bill on tungsten ore increases the rate of the Payne-Aldrich Act over 1,100 per cent; that it is over twelve times more than the Payne-Aldrich rate. That has not been denied, and that can not be denied in truth on this floor. I just dare one of them to deny it. They will have all of to-day to do it under the five-minute rule.

I stated that on tungsten and ferrotungsten the rate put into this bill by the Republican Ways and Means Committee, at the demand of the beneficiaries of this bill, was an increase of the rate in the Payne-Aldrich Act of over 800 per cent; that it was over nine times as high as the rate of the Payne-Aldrich Act. That has not been denied and can not be denied.

I stated that in this bill, with the $1 per pound on tungsten and ferrotungsten and ferrotungsten powders, while they claim that this $1 is only needed as a compensatory duty to offset the duty which is levied on the ore, it amounts to $750 a ton more than is necessary to cover every cent of such compensatory duty. That has not been denied, and it can not be denied in truth. We have been and will continue all day discussing this bill. I challenge the author of the bill or any Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee or any Republican in the House to deny the truth of any one of these statements. You will have all day to do it in, but not one of you will be bold enough to deny any one of them. Gentlemen know that I have the proof before me of each statement I made, and now repeat. Mr. Chairman, I shall at the proper time move an amendment to reduce the rates in this bill down to the rate of the Payne-Aldrich Act, under which we were producing 75 per cent of the ore that we used in this country. But I know it will fail, because the Republican machine of this House will make it fail, as every Republican in this House has been ordered to vote for this bill just as it is. I am glad that you are going to repudiate the Payne Tariff Act to that extent. If you repudiate it by voting down my motion to restore the Payne-Aldrich tariff rates on tungsten ore and ferrotungsten, I shall then propose an amendment increasing the Payne tariff rates 100 per cent, making the rates on these products twice as high as the Payne-Aldrich rate.

Even that will be five times better than the bill you have now. I expect to see every Republican in this House, at the dictates of the machine, vote against that, and I shall expect to see every man on that side in this House, by his own confession and vote, repudiate and doubly repudiate the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act with respect to these products. I expect to see every Republican here throw away their convictions, their judgment, their very consciences almost, and vote just as the manufacturers and the beneficiaries of this plundering tariff demands that they shall vote, through the machine in control of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to bring something else to the attention of this committee, and I challenge any man on that side to deny it, that of all the profiteers during this war, of all the thousands of industries in this country that made immense profits out of the people and out of the Government during this war, this tungsten industry stands in a class by itself. I say it has made 100 per cent more profit than any other industry in this country during this war. I make the statement and challenge any gentleman here to deny it, that in 1916, before we actually got into the war, these tungsten-ore producers that are demanding this excessive, unparalleled tariff, after paying every cent of the operating expenses, including overhead charges, taxes, and insurance, and even allowance for depreciation, made enough profit to take every cent of the capital that they put into the business and put it back into their pockets, and then, after getting back their capital had remaining as further profits over $10,000,000, or 150 per cent more than the total capital put in, with the capital already in their pockets. Let me give the figures taken from the report of the Tariff Commission. They produced, in 1916, 5,900 tons.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more to finish this, so that I need not get it by moving to strike out the last word in the next section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. They produced 5,900 tons in 1916 and they sold it for $24,780,000. This is found on page 9 of the report. At that time they had a capital of only $5,000,000 invested in it. They claim now that they have $8,000,000 invested in it. There is not a word of evidence from any man that produced ore who has said it cost him in that year to produce it as much as $800 a ton. I am going to say it cost them $1,000 a ton, $200 more than the evidence shows that it cost them. I am going to give them 6,000 tons, when they only produced 5,900 tons. They had only $5,000,000 of capital at that time, but I will give them $8,000,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If that is true, why was it necessary for the last Congress to offer a bonus to these people for the production of this ore for war purposes only?

Mr. KITCHIN. The act to which the gentleman refers authorized the Secretary of the Interior practically to offer bonuses for the discovery or production of war minerals. But he never did so. He never offered any to the producers of tungsten ore.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Tungsten was particularly mentioned.

Mr. KITCHEN. No. No bonus was ever offered to any tungsten-ore producer. And they did not discover or produce as much ore after that act was passed as in 1916. The act was passed only about a month before the armistice.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That was in itself an admission of the necessity of producing more of this ore than we were then producing.

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no such admission in it. The producers of the ore were producing all they could and making unheard-of profits. Let us get back to the immense profits of 1916. I am allowing them $2,000,000 more than all the capital they had, or $8,000,000. I am allowing them as operating and producing expense $200 a ton more than the evidence shows it cost them to produce. Six thousand tons at an operating cost per ton of $1,000 amounts to $6,000,000 as total cost to produce. That added to the $8,000,000 I allow them as capital is $14,000,000. They got $24,780,000 for it, so after paying every dollar of expense in the production, and after having returned all their capital and $2,000,000 more in one year's operations, they have cleaned up a clear net profit of $10,780,000, over 125 per cent; and counting the capital which they were able to put back into their pockets, 225 per cent clear net profit in the one year 1916. The figures of the Tariff Commission—their own figures—according to their own evidence show that in addition to this in 1917 and 1918 they made over $6,000,000 clear profit, with their $8,000,000 capital already returned to them. I want to tell you now that the man, whether he is a Republican or a Democrat, who votes for this bill will be voting for downright, stark-naked plunder and robbery. [Applause.] I want to hear somebody deny these figures that I have given. The distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. FORDNEY] yesterday—let me show just how much these gentlemen know about this bill and about this subject. Mr. FORDNEY yesterday said, "Oh, what is Mr. KITCHIN making all this fuss about this for when this little tariff—when you figure it down—will not make an additional cost of tungsten steel of more than one one-thousandth of 1 cent a pound." That is, you take a cent and cut it up into a thousand pieces, and take one of those pieces, and that is all it is going to add to the cost per pound of tungsten steel. Now, the fact is that the additional cost in a pound of tungsten steel by virtue of this bill if passed is 18 cents, and in a ton it is going to cost 2,000 times that, or $360. This is shown by the testimony of their star witness, Mr. McKenna, on page 41 of the hearings.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent for five more minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. If you will tell the truth I will not object, but now you have made a statement which is not correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will object unless he confines himself to the facts as to what I said.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will take the stenographic notes of what you said. They will show that I stated exactly what you said.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not want to misstate what the gentleman said.

Mr. FORDNEY. I read from the record of what an expert said, and you know it.

Mr. KITCHIN. And I repeated what you read, did I not?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; you did not. Read it from the record and you will get it right.

Mr. KITCHIN. Have you got your notes here, unrevised?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Hand them to me and if you did not say what I said, I will give up. [Laughter.] Hand them to me. Read them again and they will show I quoted you correctly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the leaders of the House ought to use parliamentary language in addressing each other. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is certainly right.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is well taken. Gentlemen should not address each other in the second person.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman from Michigan will kindly furnish me with the shorthand notes of his speech, which he has in his possession, I will read from those notes and will show him that I quoted him correctly and I will show that he is as far out of the way as 1 cent is from 18,000. [Laughter.] That is all the difference; because the evidence is that in a pound of tungsten steel this tariff rate alone will make an extra cost of 18 cents, because 18 per cent of a pound of tungsten steel is tungsten. This tariff bill puts a dollar a pound on tungsten, and that makes 18 cents in one pound of tungsten steel. So instead of being one one-thousandth of 1 per cent, as the gentleman put it, it is eighteen thousand times that much, or 18 cents. [Applause.] So, with all due respect to the gentleman, he is just as wide apart from an accurate knowledge of it as 1 is from 18,000. [Laughter.] And further, with all due deference, the gentleman has just as much accurate knowledge about that as he has about the provisions of this bill. [Applause.]

Now, another thing I want to say: The Republicans urge the passage of this bill on the ground that the articles upon which it places the tariff are absolute war essentials. Are you honest in that? Do you think we ought to treat them as war essential minerals and metals? I admit that tungsten ore and tungsten are war essentials. They are absolutely necessary. Now, gentlemen, that being so, if you can just conquer your prejudices for a minute, if you can put aside your prejudices in favor of a protective tariff for "American industries" and look at this calmly in the spirit of real patriotism, then you can not vote for this bill.

The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] in one question went to the vitals of this matter as a war essential. Gentlemen remember that Dr. Hess, of the Geological Survey, who Hon. George Otis Smith, the head of that survey, said had been giving 13 years of special study to these and other minerals, testified before our committee that so far as he could see or anyone could see now, the total available amount in sight of tungsten ore in this country was 9,000 tons, and with a production of 3,000 tons a year would only last three years, and yet we need in this country from 5,000 to 7,000 tons a year. All in sight, says this expert, is 9,000 tons, which would give us 3,000 tons a year for only three years.

Mr. YOUNG went right to the heart of it. He asked Dr. Hess:

A good deal has been said here about the desirability of bracing ourselves for the next war, if we have one. Now, if we use up all the tungsten we have in the United States during this period of peace following the war, and another war comes on and ties up the ocean transportation, in what position are we going to be to get our supply of tungsten ore to carry us through the next war?

To this Dr. Hess replied as follows:

Well, sir, we are going to be like a man in a boat on the wide ocean; there is plenty of water, but you can not drink.

I say that it is far better, far wiser to let this war essential ore remain untouched in the earth, to serve our country in the stress of war, if another should ever come, and let our people in peace times buy and use for commercial purposes the cheaper foreign ore than to pass this outrageous bill to gratify the avarice of the monopoly of four corporations. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The day before yesterday the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] made one of his characteristic speeches. He has continued it to-day. Brilliant and able as the gentleman is—and I do not know anyone in the House more brilliant and able—the speech that he made was chiefly remarkable for the amount of misinformation that it conveyed to the House. I have known the gentleman since I came into Congress some eight years ago. When I first heard him deliver one of his tariff speeches I wondered that a gentleman of so much ability could be so obsessed on a subject, but I finally discovered that a large number of gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House were afflicted with what might be called "tariffphobia," a very dangerous disease, which renders the victim unable to see the facts with reference to any tariff matter, and also renders him utterly unable to state what they are. The gentleman from North Carolina has had this disease in the most violent form ever since I have known him. I have hoped at times that he might show some signs of recovery, but I have seen none, and have therefore concluded that he is beyond recovery.

The gentleman was more than usually entertaining the other day in making his speech. He had the jokes and I have the facts, and I want you to hear some of them. Permit me to let out some of the hot air from the balloons that were raised the other day and that have been inflated again this morning. It will be remembered that one of the subjects upon which the gentleman addressed the House so earnestly and in regard to which he received such great applause from the Democratic side was the fact that there was a manufacturer called before the Ways and Means Committee who testified with relation to what the tariff on tungsten ought to be. The gentleman spoke of the fact that the Republicans were always calling manufacturers, and indeed they do, because they allow them to state their side of the case. I fear very much, however, that some deluded gentleman on the Democratic side of the House thought the manufacturer called was one who was interested in having a high tariff. As a matter of fact a manufacturer of tungsten-steel tools, as this man was—and as I believe everyone in the House must know—is a man interested in keeping the tariff down. Who was this man, McKenna, this man who got up before the committee and to whom, according to the gentleman from North Carolina, the committee weakly yielded? He made the statement that the miners ought to have a tariff of $10 a unit on tungstic trioxide.

Mr. McKenna is the president of the Vanadium Alloys Steel Co., which manufactures cutting tools, in which tungsten is used, and is one of the largest consumers of tungsten in this country. He is also an importer. That is the kind of men who came before us and said that the miners ought to have a tariff of $10 a unit on tungstic trioxide.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Why, Mr. McKenna said that they owned ore mines and were interested in that way, too.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; they once had a mine.

Mr. KITCHIN. And Mr. Holmes, who was secretary and treasurer of one of the big companies——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, hold on. You can not make a speech in my time. Let me show how unfair your statement is.

Mr. KITCHIN. He says——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I decline to yield further.

Mr. KITCHIN. And Mr. Bailey, who said he represented the miners, said that he wanted a tariff of $10 a ton.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, the gentleman has talked for an hour. I have not been speaking for three minutes, and yet he will not let me talk. Will my friend allow me to proceed?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, I permitted the gentleman to interrupt me, to correct me. Will not the gentleman accord me the same privilege?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, no; I did not interrupt the gentleman at all. The gentleman from North Carolina says that this man was interested in a mine. He was interested in a mine which he tried to operate at a time when tungsten was high and lost money on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There was an affiliated company with the company which he owned, which at one time had an interest in a mine, and perhaps has the mine yet, worthless as it is, because they found they could not operate it at a profit during a time when tungsten was high. That is the situation with reference to this matter.

I asked the gentleman who there was who objected to the bill. That was the one solitary interruption that the gentleman from North Carolina talks about. I asked him that brief question, and what was his answer?

I said, "What party objected to this bill that came before the committee?" and he said, "The Democratic Party." The poor, old, decrepit Democratic Party is the only one that objected to this bill. Everybody else was satisfied.

As a matter of fact, on whom did the committee call? The most disinterested witnesses they could get. They called a man from the Tariff Commission, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], in commenting upon his testimony before the committee, said we would be likely to get the most disinterested testimony possible from somebody on that commission. Who else was called? A man from the Geological Survey, Mr. Hess. Can anyone be more disinterested than he? Who else talked before them? Importers? Yes; men who naturally did not want a tariff, and yet these importers said that this tariff ought to be granted. They were patriotic enough to support the bill, although it was not in their interest. They came in and said so. The firm of Gilchrist & Predmore sent a letter to us saying this tariff ought to be granted, although they are probably the largest importers. There was really only one person——

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Just for a question; yes.

Mr. JUUL. Am I correct in understanding this levies a tariff of 50 cents per pound on this metal?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No. It is a tariff of a dollar a pound upon the pure metal content.

Mr. JUUL. The unit is here described as 20 pounds.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is getting me off my line of thought. He means a unit of tungstic trioxide.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman said he was going to state a number of facts, and this is one fact I would like to ascertain correctly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is all given in the hearing. A unit is 20 pounds of tungstic trioxide. The gentleman understands that that is not the pure metal at all.

Mr. JUUL. That is exactly what I want to get at.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Tungstic trioxide is not the pure metal. It takes about 2½ or 2¼ pounds of tungstic trioxide to make a pound of the pure metal.

Mr. JUUL. I am glad to get these facts.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But I want to show the House that the committee heard men who were absolutely disinterested for the most part.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. Did these men of whom you speak give an opinion as to the amount of protection that should be placed upon this tungsten?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They did, and they were absolutely disinterested in the matter of giving information on the subject.

Mr. BUTLER. This rate is consistent with the views of the gentlemen of whom the gentleman spoke?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is in accordance with the views of those gentlemen, or the figures given by them.

Mr. KITCHIN. Did I understand the gentleman to say the tariff commission? There was so much talk going on. Did I understand the gentleman to say the tariff commission recommended these rates?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; he did not; but he gave facts and figures from which those rates would have to be inferred. He showed that in his personal opinion—for it was easy to read between the lines—but not speaking for the commission, this tariff ought to be granted. Now, that shows how far astray the gentleman has been in the statement that he has made, leading you to believe that we followed the opinion of interested parties when in fact we took the opinion of parties whose natural interest would be in the other direction, and still they said this tariff ought to be the amount given.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Are the parties in interest—those who use the tungsten, who actively mine and develop it and use it in the industrialism of the country—have they made any objection against this tariff rate?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There was not a particle of objection from anybody. We have the testimony of consumers. We have the testimony of the men who use tungsten in manufacturing. We took the testimony of men who had interest in the other direction, and there was not a particle of objection from anybody. Well, I will correct that in one respect: There was a man who came before us—and we gave him a careful hearing—who had a mine over in South America, and he objected to this rate and said it was too much. He was the only man out of all the witnesses who came here who made a particle of objection to it.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I would like to ask the gentleman if the same gentleman did not acknowledge from the information he had that that rate was necessary for the mills of this country and the mines to operate?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. He did, and he said he was paying $1.25 a day wages in his mine as against $4 and $6 a day paid in the mines here.

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do.

Mr. SEARS. The gentleman said the consumers' representatives appeared before the committee. Will the gentleman name some consumer who appeared?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The manufacturer of vanadium steel tools was a consumer.

Mr. SEARS. But I understand, though, he is a manufacturer and sold it and also is interested in mines. I mean the real consumer.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. He was not interested in mines, except he had lost a lot of money in a mine which he had tried to operate.

Mr. SEARS. And now he wants to get it back?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. He had no way of getting it back; he could not get it back under the high price that prevailed, so he can not get it back now.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can not.

Mr. BLANTON. Just for one question.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Go ahead.

Mr. BLANTON. The American people are the consumers, and if they have to pay three and a half million dollars by reason of this bill because of 6,000 tons now being stored, we want to know what they say about the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will tell you what they would say about the bill. I will dispose of that matter. The gentleman from North Carolina said that by reason of there being some five or six thousand tons of ore stored at New York somebody was going to make $3,000,000 out of it. What did that ore cost? It cost somewhere from $17.50 to $30 per unit of tungstic trioxide, and that was what ore cost. Now, if this bill goes into effect it is not expected and there is no reason to believe that it will sell in excess of $17.50 on the market; so that instead of these men making this great sum the gentleman from North Carolina talks about there is merely a possibility they may recoup what they invested in war time in the hope of supplying the needs of the Government for tungsten. And I want to say further, in order to take care of any of this cheap ore that may come in before the bill becomes a law, I have an amendment which I shall offer to the bill which I have not time to discuss now. So much for that matter which was harped upon by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Now, there was another matter which the gentleman spoke of, and that was the question that he said he propounded to us. I wonder if the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] can state that question now. I wonder if he could get it the same way. I was not listening when he propounded it, and do not know what it was. My friend from Colorado, who asked him a question about the question, said the inquiry was as to how much ore would be required to make a ton of pure tungsten. So that the question——

Mr. KITCHIN. I will ask the question, which you could not answer day before yesterday, and I suppose that you have taken the last 48 hours to find out the right answer to it. It is, How much 60 per cent WO_3 standard tungsten ore will be required to make a ton of ferrotungsten?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, now, the gentleman can not answer that himself, nor can anybody else. That is one of those "foolish questions, No. 999999."

Mr. KITCHIN. I have the answer here, from the Geological Survey and the Tariff Commission.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman knows, and he ought to know, if he has studied this subject, even by taking this 60 per cent ore, it depends on the kind of ore as to how much you get out of it.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I said 60 per cent ore.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. You can not always refine 60 per cent out of it, even if it is classed as 60 per cent ore.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is in the bill. That is how the report defines it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If that is true, it is a simple matter of computation of figures.

Mr. KITCHIN. Which you can not do and concerning which you do not know.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not know what your question was. You were not sure of it.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will permit it, I will leave it now and ask him to answer——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will answer it as quickly as you can ask it.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I want to answer the question for the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. He remembers the question this morning. He answered it the other day in his speech, but he has not printed that speech yet, and we can not see what his answer was. He answered his own question after I answered it, that there was about a ton and a fourth entering into a ton of pure product. But here is the answer, if the gentleman wants it. From 1 ton of tungsten ore of 60 per cent——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] be extended 10 minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Make it two minutes. I am taking time from the gentleman from Michigan, who wants to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended two minutes.

Mr. JUUL. Make it five minutes.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I dislike to take the gentleman's time to answer this question.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I want you to do so.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I want to answer this and get it into the RECORD. There is recovered as pure tungsten out of a ton of tungstic ore of the richness of 60 per cent WO_3 758 pounds. That is, 1 ton of 2,000 pounds tungsten ore equals 758 pounds pure tungsten. That enters into the tungsten steel and ferrotungsten in various percentages, in accordance with the nature of the alloy. As the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] stated, the tariff on this amount to be covered is $1 per pound of pure tungsten, or $758, instead of the amount quoted by the gentleman.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can not yield to the gentleman. I just want to say it is perfectly plain, if the gentleman has given the question now as he wants it, that 60 per cent ore, if it is made to yield 60 per cent, will bring 1,200 pounds of tungstic trioxide, and it takes, as I said before, 2½ tons of tungstic trioxide to make a ton of pure ore, and that will give you the amount required if anybody wants to fix it. Therefore the answer of the gentleman from North Carolina was entirely wrong.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a different question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I want the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], and I know he is a conscientious man, to answer a question. The whole dispute between the Republican and Democratic members of the House and the Ways and Means Committee is as to the rate to be levied. Does the gentleman from Iowa say he does not believe that twice the amount of the tariff in the Payne bill is sufficient when under that bill they were producing 75 per cent of the product? Will the gentleman say that?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; I will say it when we come to the bill and when your amendment is offered. I do not care to take the time now, because I am taking the time which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] ought to have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MADDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed joint resolutions and bill of the following titles:

On August 15, 1919:

H. J. Res. 150. Joint resolution to suspend the requirements of annual assessment work on certain mining claims during the year 1919;

H. J. Res. 163. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of Labor to lease the Charleston immigration station and dock connected therewith; and

H. R. 7110. An act extending the time for the construction of a bridge across Flint River, in the State of Georgia.

TUNGSTEN ORES IN THE UNITED STATES.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 20 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, when the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] a little while ago referred to a statement that I made on the floor of the House day before yesterday he was unfair. I want to repeat exactly what I did say. I read from the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means, and from a statement furnished by William Loach, chairman of the tungsten committee of the Boulder County Metal Mining Association.

He said:

> Extending this increase of cost into the finished steel, we arrive at the ratio of 15 cents per ton, or seventy-five one-thousandths of 1 cent per pound finished steel.

That testimony is in the record. Whether it is correct or not I do not know. I am not an expert on the manufacture or use of tungsten. Neither is there a man on this floor who is an expert and who knows all about the manufacture of tungsten. We must rely upon information given by experts that appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means, and that is the information that I rely upon.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will, if you will be very brief.

Mr. VAILE. I wish to suggest to the gentleman that the consumer of finished steel is the consumer that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is so concerned about—the ultimate consumer.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. Gentlemen, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] said yesterday that "when the manufacturers of this country came before the Committee on Ways and Means Mr. FORDNEY sat there in fear and trembling." [Laughter.] He said that when the manufacturer said "I want 60 cents duty," Mr. FORDNEY immediately wroté down 60 cents and gave it to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will permit me, I never said that.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is the substance of the gentleman's statement. Whether those were the correct words or not, that is the substance of your statement. You never saw me in fear and trembling when any man was testifying before the committee, did you? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman permit me to make a correction? Both of us want to be fair to each other. Will the gentleman permit me there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I will yield, but I will ask the gentleman to be brief, if he please.

Mr. KITCHIN. I never said that when the manufacturer said "I want $10 a unit" Mr. FORDNEY wrote it down. I said Mr. FORDNEY said, "What rate do you want?" He says, "$10 a unit." Then I took up the bill and read from the bill. Everybody knows what you did. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. In his very entertaining speech on Tuesday the gentleman from North Carolina implied that Republicans accepted information from American producers as the basis for the rates of duty provided for in this bill. I might add that in the recent hearings before the committee we listened to some very sound testimony from representatives of American laboring men favorable to tariff protection. Further, we heard representatives of the Geological Survey, the American Mining Congress, and the Tariff Commission, and were quite convinced that in the interest of industrial independence for America prompt tariff protection should be afforded the tungsten industry.

In reply to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and by way of contrast, permit me to offer a bit of evidence that came to light in 1916 indicating the caliber of people whom the Democrats seemed to have blindly followed and catered to in the preparation of the tariff act of October 3, 1913. Truth will come to light. It took this information two years to come to the surface, but when it did come out it bubbled forth in an altogether unique and convincing manner. Silician fruit producers, it appears, together with some Italian importers, employed an attorney by the name of Beer, with offices at 71 Broadway, New York City, to lobby for a reduction on the import duty on lemons. The major portion of the fee was contingent upon results obtained, and on November 15, 1915, Mr. Beer filed a suit to collect the balance of the fee, which he claimed had not been paid as provided for by contract.

A very interesting report of the suit appeared in the New York Sun in March, 1916, and the following are significant extracts from the statement published in that paper. I referred to this matter once before on the floor of the House:

"It was provided," Beer said, "by the terms of the said agreement that the defendants were to pay the plaintiff and the said Osborne the sum of $15,000 as a retainer, together with all expenses incurred by the plaintiff, and the said Osborne is endeavoring to obtain the aforesaid revision and general reduction of the said duty, and an additional sum of $60,000 in the event that the duty on Italian lemons, either through act of Congress or any other function or instrumentality of the United States Government, was reduced to the rate equal to the rate of duty provided in the so-called Wilson Tariff Act."

Mention is made in the affidavit of a supplementary agreement that in case the tariff was cut from $1.20 a box to 35 cents they were to have the $60,000.

They went to work. The affidavit describing their labors says that they frequently appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Committee on Finance, hired speakers, and sent out millions of pieces of "literature."

"We can only say about this suit of Mr. Beer that we are surprised," said S. Amoroso, second vice president of the Importers' Union, yesterday. "Why should we be sued for $75,000 or $110,000? Why has it not been paid?

"We did raise a fund, amounting in all to about $140,000, to have the tariff on Sicilian lemons reduced, and we did hire Mr. Beer to have it done. In the United States the importers, by paying 5 cents a box on lemons imported, raised $105,000, and the Sicilian societies raised $35,000 more. Now that is all over, we are asked for $75,000 more.

"What has become of the $140,000? We do not know. We have repeatedly asked for an accounting and have not received it. We have demanded it and it has not been given to us. We are told to keep quiet, not to raise a row."

Mr. Beer presented his interpretation of the situation last night. His suit, he said, will soon be settled by the Sicilian societies of Palermo. "And I will be glad to get out of it," said Mr. Beer. "I do not want any more trouble like this. I do not mind saying that beginning with 1910 we accomplished some mighty effective work."

There are 2,000,000 voters of Italian blood in this country, he explained, and his first work was to get every one of them stirred up. Documents were sent to them favoring the Italian fruit growers, and letters, papers, "missionaries," speakers, and postal cards were used.

"In 1910," he said, "the effect of this movement was shown in the votes of close districts. All the Italians voted for the Democrats, and the Democrats realized it." In the presidential campaign of 1912 Mr. Beer said the Italians were in full swing for Woodrow Wilson. "We organized the Italian Democratic League," he said, "and had branches all over the country. We did nothing but preach democracy to them. I am a Republican except where my client's interests are concerned, and I want to say that the effectiveness of our work was well known and recognized."

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

The Fruit Importers' Union, through President Zito, has submitted the following statement * * * of the receipts and disbursements in connection with the campaign and general office and labor expenses:

Cash received from July, 1910, to Aug., 1913.

PER TAX OF 5 CENTS PER BOX COLLECTED BY AUCTIONEERS, SICILIAN LEMONS.

Brown & Seccomb, from July, 1910, to Mar., 1911	$12,854.55
Connolly Auction Co., from July, 1910, to Mar., 1911	27,557.79
H. Harris & Co., from July, 1910, to Mar., 1911	663.29
Philadelphia Auction Co., from July, 1910, to Mar., 1911	1,583.08
N. O. Fruit Auction Co., from July, 1910, to Mar., 1911	1,494.54

We, the undersigned, members of the finance committee, have examined the books of the Fruit Importers' Union and have found accounting correct and to our entire satisfaction.

GIUSEPPE CAPPADONIA.
FRANK ZITO.
S. AMOROSO.

They also submit the following letter, dated September 15, 1913:

"Members of the general assembly of the Fruit Importers' Union, in their meeting of to-day, have voted on the motion of Mr. Fortunato Marciano D'Arsi as follows:

"'Mr. D'Arsi moves that the members of the assembly give a vote of confidence to the board of trustees of the Fruit Importers' Union for having so wisely conducted the difficult negotiations for the reduction of the tariff on imported lemons, and at the same time to authorize them, the said board of trustees, to complete the possibility of the collection to pay the obligations assumed (at their own convenience) to the lawyers, collaborators who assumed to obtain the reduction of the tax on imported lemons.'"

The duty on lemons under the Payne tariff law was 1½ cents per pound. On the crate in general use this duty amounted to $1.20. It is interesting to note that the tariff act of October 3, 1913, reduced the duty on lemons in packages—exceeding 1¼ and not exceeding 2½ cubic feet—to 35 cents per package. On lemons in bulk the duty was reduced to 1½ cents per pound. This rate—35 cents per crate—is what Mr. Beer contracted to secure. In the suit and in statements concerning the controversy he claimed he did effective work for the Democratic Party and that his efforts were recognized.

Now, I ask, to whom did the Democrats listen when they were framing the Underwood tariff law? The producers of lemons in Florida and California were here protesting against a reduction of the duty on lemons, and at the same time the importers and foreigners maintained a highly paid lobby to work for a reduction. The duty was reduced and the paid lawyers of the importers claim they did effective work and were recognized. Gentlemen on the Democratic side, I do not make accusations of dishonesty, but I do say, however, that you gave your whole time and attention to, and permitted yourselves to be influenced by, the importer and the foreigner, absolutely to the detriment of your own people. [Applause.] Now, when Republicans come before Congress and offer a bill to increase the duty on tungsten, a very important metal, a metal absolutely necessary to industry in time of peace and war, you rise up in horror with accusations of bad faith. You accuse Republicans of being influenced by monopoly and not considering the laboring people of the Nation. No matter who makes it, that statement is far from true. We believe in America first, and we value industrial independence for the Nation. In framing tariff laws, the Republicans take into consideration all the people of every State in the Union without prejudice in favor of one industry or one State against another. [Applause.]

While alluding to the statements of the gentleman from North Carolina I want to state his general assumption "that the entire import duty is added to the price of all articles in this country" is erroneous and can not be substantiated. Upon this fallacious assumption he bases his tariff arguments. If his reasoning is sound, why do you think the people interested in Sicilian lemons were so willing to gamble $140,000 in an effort to secure a reduction of duties on their products? Will anyone contend they did not know they could add a sufficient sum to their selling price to reimburse themselves? It was worth many times $140,000 to get the reduction on citrus fruits.

Please listen to this testimony of Dr. Herty, formerly the head of the chemistry department of the University of North Carolina, relative to the effect of certain increased tariff rates contained in the act of 1916. I am reading from page 152 of hearings before the Ways and Means Committee on June 19 and 20 of this year:

Mr. MOORE. Then, the inference is that there was such competition in the manufacture in the United States following the passage of the act of 1916 that the prices were reduced?

Dr. HERTY. That was the point.

Mr. MOORE. The manufacture increased and the prices came down despite the fact that we levied a tariff in 1916?

Dr. HERTY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE. That is what you intend to illustrate?

Dr. HERTY. That bears out the situation.

Mr. HULL. You do not intend to convey the idea that competition would hold prices down under any kind of a tariff that might be necessary to protect the dyestuff industry?

Dr. HERTY. I can only judge by the results as shown here. The prices are coming down and there is competition.

Mr. MOORE. You came here from North Carolina, where you had been at the head of a college?

Dr. HERTY. The head of the chemistry department.

Mr. MOORE. Dr. Herty had become, by reason of his experience and knowledge of chemistry, one of the leading chemists in the United States and came here, despite all traditions, to support a protective tariff with regard to dyestuffs, and in spite of the fact that a tariff was levied which was supposed to be a high tariff and which according to the theories of some gentlemen increases the cost of the product to the consumer in the United States. He comes here now to state that the operation of the law has been to so stimulate the industry in the United States as to encourage chemists to go to work and increase the manufacture, and that the prices have gone down by reason of the competition within the United States. That is what the doctor shows. Am I right about that?

Dr. HERTY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE. The price has gone steadily down in the United States and production has increased, so that we have been able to supply the consumer cheaper than ever before, despite the fact that a high tariff was levied. That is the fact?

Dr. HERTY. Yes, sir.

Does not this lead you to believe that the foreigner does not give the consumer in America the benefit of every tariff reduction? In 1909 an increased duty imposed upon hosiery transferred the major portion of the industry to this country, and domestic competition resulted in lower prices. Likewise, the duty was increased on post cards, with a corresponding result. Prior to 1909 over 90 per cent of the post cards were "made in Germany," and the universal price was 5 cents a card. Soon after a substantial import duty was levied 95 per cent of our post cards were made in America, and the popular retail price was 1 cent a card. This price resulted from healthy competition at home. I could show you how sugar prices have advanced during the season and the domestic crop is off the market. I could give any number of instances to prove that the basic assumption upon which the gentleman from North Carolina founds his arguments is ridiculous and unbusinesslike.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] said that this rate is a 900 per cent increase over the Payne tariff rate on tungsten. Why, you can fix any percentage of increase you care to think up, from nothing to everything, and that is just what you are doing. There is no imported tungsten which under existing law pays any duty. It comes in free. The only duty paid is on such tungsten as comes in in the form of metal, and not in the form of ore, therefore a per cent of duty may be rated very many hundred per cent when counted from nothing to something.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. There was a duty in the Payne-Aldrich law on tungsten ore and on pure tungsten.

Mr. FORDNEY. Ten per cent ad valorem.

Mr. GARNER. Ten per cent ad valorem on the ore and 20 per cent ad valorem on the tungsten.

Mr. FORDNEY. Depending on the value of the article.

Mr. GARNER. The value of the article.

Mr. FORDNEY. When valued at less than $200 a ton the duty was 10 per cent ad valorem, and when valued at more than $200 a ton the duty was 20 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. GARNER. Yes. Now let me ask the gentleman this question: The Payne-Aldrich law having had that duty, the question here is not so much as to whether you are letting somebody dictate the rate of duty. The question is as to the rate. I think that is the main question that every man in this House wants to consider.

Mr. FORDNEY. I agree with the gentleman. That is fair.

Mr. GARNER. Why are you not willing to say that twice the amount of the Payne-Aldrich duty should be sufficient to maintain this industry when you consider the fact that 75 per cent of the tungsten used in this country was produced in this country under the Payne-Aldrich tariff? Will the gentleman answer that one question?

Mr. FORDNEY. The duty in the Payne-Aldrich law was ad valorem, and this duty is specific.

Mr. GARNER. Just a moment——

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me answer you.

Mr. GARNER. All right.

Mr. FORDNEY. Tungsten is selling now for $7.50 a unit in this country. The ore in this country that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] referred to as being stored here was imported, as the evidence from a Government authority shows, at from $20 to $30 a unit. That is what the ore cost the importer. During the war, when we must have tungsten and must depend on imported tungsten, we paid as high as $90 a unit. Now, if you will base the ad valorem rate on $90 a unit, you will have $9,000 a ton duty, or if based on $10 a unit, the duty would be $1,000. You can not measure an ad valorem duty fairly in comparison with a specific duty when the value fluctuates from $7.50 a unit to $90 a unit. It is no fair comparison, sir. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. I believe the gentleman from Michigan will admit that it is nearly impossible, if not quite impossible, to get at the cost of production in this country and the cost of production abroad. Therefore it is difficult to levy any rate from that standpoint. Now, I am putting this concrete situation to the gentleman: Under the Payne Act we produced 75 per cent of the tungsten used in this country. If we double the rate, ought not that to be sufficient to enable us to continue to produce 75 per cent of the tungsten used in this country?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I do not think so.

Mr. GARNER. Tell me why.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will tell you why as nearly as I can. It is a very difficult question to answer under present conditions, but the gentleman is fair and his question is fair. My good friend, it does not depend so much upon the justness of the duty as it does upon sustaining an industry that we must have when we need it badly. What difference does it make to you whether the rate is high or low, if the question is whether we can be sure of getting the metal to fight the enemy when we need it? That is the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARNER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more in order that he may answer my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Michigan be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. I am just as anxious as the gentleman from Michigan is to maintain this industry in this country and have it so that in case of war we may have this metal.

Mr. FORDNEY. I had not quite concluded my answer.

Mr. GARNER. As I say, I am just as anxious to maintain this industry in this country as the gentleman is, so that we may have a sufficiency of it in case of war. The only question here is as to the rate, and I submit that when under the Payne-Aldrich Act we produced in this country 75 per cent of the metal necessary to run the Government, on a 10 per cent duty, now that we propose on this side to double that amount it does seem to me that that rate should be sufficient to maintain the industry in this country.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have not time to read from the record, but the gentleman is fair about it and I have a statement before our committee which shows that the major portion of the tungsten ore of the world is controlled by the British, and in Asia where the ore is controlled by the British they are mining it and bringing it to England for $1.92 a unit, tungsten ore of 60 per cent purity. When the price of tungsten declined to $17 a unit after the armistice our mines were compelled to close down, and they have been closed ever since. We can not produce it for less than $17 per unit. That is the testimony before the committee. Other testimony is that China can produce tungsten and lay it down in this country at $7 and $8 a unit.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] seems to be harping upon the fact that under the Payne-Aldrich Act we produced 75 per cent of tungsten used in this country.

Mr. FORDNEY. We used a very small amount at that time.

Mr. SNYDER. At that period the use of tungsten in self-hardening steel was hardly known, and the quantity which we produced then, which may have been 75 per cent, is less than 10 per cent of what we are using to-day.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. Out of our total annual consumption of some 7,500 tons to-day we are producing but 25 per cent, which is more than 100 per cent of our consumption at the time the gentleman referred to. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A Bourbon has been described as a man who forgets nothing and who learns nothing. The world moves and constantly changes and wise men change with it, but your Bourbon never does. He is the only finite thing on this mundane sphere to whom may be ascribed those attributes of the infinite—the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. Other men learn, he never does. Experience means nothing to him. It is true that his virtues do not change, but neither do his vices. He has so very few virtues, however, that that does not matter much.

Some Democrats have objected to the appellation of the name "Bourbon" to their party, and I am frank to say that in the recent past, at times, the party has made just a little progress; at least some of its members have in getting away from Bourbonism, but so far as certain gentlemen in command of the party are concerned, we have had the strongest kind of proof in the last day or two that their Bourbonism continues unchanging as of yore.

We have had a great war, and the Great War has taught most of the people of the world many things. It has emphasized—aye, it has burned into the minds and consciences of all wise men—the fact that nations to grow and prosper and hold their place on the world and be mighty and influential for good in the world must in the main be self-supporting. The war has proven to wise men the utter folly of depending upon others for those vital and essential things which you may and can produce yourself. The war brought us face to face with a situation in which this, the greatest Nation on earth, the most powerful people in the world, the land of the greatest resources, was at the mercy of foreigners and of the enemy. We lacked the materials necessary for the manufacture of powder needed to hurl the instruments of destruction. We lacked the minerals that were essential to put a cutting edge on the tools necessary to make the implements and instruments of destruction. We propose to see that such a condition does not exist in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Strong and forceful, powerful though we were, we were almost helpless in the face of a foreign monopoly on certain essential products. Most of the American people took an oath deep down in their hearts that this condition should not exist in a future emergency. [Applause.] Yes, and the people who pledged themselves to that proposition do not all of them vote the Republican ticket, and they have not all of them heretofore subscribed themselves as protectionists, for there is some wisdom even among bourbons, among the forward looking of the party. We have looked forward to the time when we should be able to place America in a position of independence in the matter of essential materials. We have looked forward to that time in the hope and expectation that we would have some little support at least from the Democratic side of the aisle, and I think we will have some such support. I am certain we will have it, but it is very evident that we are not to have any support, any comfort, in establishing the economic independence of America from some of the leaders on that side. [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. The very first effort that is made to establish the independence of this country in a product that is essential instead of finding the kind of support and assistance that we gave gentlemen on that side during the war we are met with unfair criticisms and misstatements of the facts.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I have only a couple of minutes.

Mr. GARNER. I shall get the gentleman some more time if I can. The gentleman is now discussing essentials. I ask the gentleman to consider the question of rates to be levied in this bill. That was the only difference between this side and the Republican side, at least so far as I am concerned. I want to fix this industry so that it will maintain itself in this country, but I do not want to levy a rate that is absolutely ridiculous, as I think the rate in this bill is. For instance, under the Payne law we had a certain rate under which we produced in this country 75 per cent of the products that we are putting the rate on. If we were able to do that under that rate, it does seem to me that if we double the rate we could continue to do the same thing.

Mr. HAMILTON. May I ask the gentleman from Texas if he is speaking for the Democratic Party in making that statement?

Mr. GARNER. I am speaking for myself.

Mr. HAMILTON. That is the way I understood it.

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad to have the statement of the gentleman from Texas that he desires to put this industry on its feet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad to have the gentleman's statement to that effect. I am inclined to believe that there are many gentlemen on that side who feel that way; but the way to accomplish that, I want to say to my friend from Texas and others, is not by relying on his judgment, for, while he is a very wise man in many ways, I assume he does not know much more about tungsten than I do. The way to accomplish that is to depend upon the judgment of men who know. The remarkable fact in connection with this bill is this, that while it is to the interest of men mining tungsten in foreign lands to have the duty low, and while it is to the selfish interest of many manufacturers to have the duty low, practically all of those who came before the committee, importer and manufacturer alike, the men representing interests that were selfishly interested in keeping the price of tungsten low, were in agreement in the main on the rates proposed by the committee. And I intend in this as in all other matters to take the judgment of the committee, to take the judgment of the men who know, to take the judgment of the men who have studied the matter and who have arrived at an agreement as to the rate. It is barely possible that the tungsten industry in America could be developed with a rate somewhat lower than that proposed. It is possible. I doubt it; but I do know this, that a rate now placed on tungsten such as is proposed will make America in a short time largely independent of foreign nations as to tungsten, and I do know that as soon as it is demonstrated that American tungsten can be produced at a rate lower than the price that will be established by competition under this law the Congress will reduce the tariff rate. [Applause.] That is the history of Republican legislation. Gentlemen, the important thing is to make us largely independent of all the world in the matter of tungsten. This rate will do it. It is doubtful if a lower rate would. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the discourse of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] in describing the Bourbon is the best description of the Republican Party that has ever been given since the morning stars first sang together. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It fits his party like a glove, for in truth it never learns anything and never forgets. The gentleman from Wyoming knows, and no one knows better, that the Republicans were driven out of this House in 1910 more on account of the Payne tariff bill than any other one operating cause. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, this strange thing happened: When the first Underwood bill was introduced here the Hon. JAMES R. MANN, who was the Republican leader then—and he was as able a Republican leader as has ever been in this House, I will say that much for him, it is my honest opinion—every time that a rate was changed from the Payne bill in the Underwood bill, he arose in his place and offered to amend by substituting the Payne rate as something almost sacred, although he voted against the conference report on the Payne bill and spoke against it. Well, now, you have got back again in the House and Senate, and you not only commence where you left off but you make it worse than it was before. There is a game played in which there is a phrase of "raising your opponent," and that is what you are doing now on your own record.

A MEMBER. What is it?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have forgotten the name of the game. But these gentlemen have gone far afield in this debate here to-day. Brother FORDNEY harked back to the tariff on lemons in 1911 or 1912, or some where along there, and spent all of his time on that. Well, whatever happened then has gone. Macauley says that when Charles II came back from exile, or as Charles himself facetiously termed it, his travels, he had the greatest opportunity any man ever had of being the most popular King of England, for all he had to do was to do what was right. But he went back to his old wallow. The consequence was his brother, the ill-fated James the Second, was sent on "his travels." I have a great deal of respect for the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. He is the only one of the whole crowd of you who has the courage of his convictions and is willing to go the whole hog. [Laughter.] You new Members here do not know it, but I have stated on the floor of this House a half a dozen times that if you gave Brother FORDNEY carte blanche to write a tariff bill there would be but one sentence in it, and that would be that anything that can be produced in America and also abroad shall not be imported into this country at all. [Laughter and applause.] But now if the rest of you will go with Mr. FORDNEY you will have it fixed to the queen's taste. He said here the other day—and it seems strange to me that he or any other man of intelligence would state such a thing, and this has nothing to do with the tungsten bill any more than his speech had [laughter]—he said here the other day, in substance, that whenever the Republicans were in charge you had prosperity, and when we were in charge you did not.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is not that true?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No, sir; it is not; not a syllable of it is true. If you can remember 1873. Gen. Grant was President. There were hardly enough Democrats in the House to call the yeas and nays. The Senate was overwhelmingly Republican; the Republicans had had the Government for years and years, and a panic swept over this country which made men's teeth rattle from sea to sea and carried bankruptcy and ruin all over the land. You may be too young to remember, but——

Mr. LAYTON. Was it not due to the war?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; it was not due to the war. I will give you a sample and let you see if it was due to the war. In 1907 Theodore Roosevelt was President. You had both Houses of Congress. You had had them for years, and there came a panic in September, October, and November of 1907 that as high a Republican authority as Senator Aldrich said was the severest panic that this country had ever known. No war produced that. Surely not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAYTON. Made to order in Wall Street?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; and Wall Street is ordering this bill here to-day, too.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that his colleague may have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, I want to tell you what I think about this debate. Like old Harper used to run horses in Kentucky, "from e'en to e'en"——

Mr. FORDNEY. I understood the gentleman to say that Wall Street ordered this bill. What evidence has the gentleman of that?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have not anything but the regular evidence, that they order the Republican tariff bills.

Mr. FORDNEY. What evidence have you of that?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have been here 25 years, and I have seen these fellows around these corridors, even in these committees, and I have never seen anybody come here to represent the great body of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It was always some fellow with an ax to grind.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman know that there were laboring men before the committee recently asking for increased duties on articles produced in this country?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I did not know it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Of course the gentleman did not. He was not present and was not trying to inform himself. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I did not know who went before the committee as to this bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman did not inform himself, did he?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Not on that particular point. Did you?

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman expressed that language when he was not really well informed, and said that we were catering to Wall Street.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, that is the gentleman's question. Does not the gentleman think that I am as well informed generally as he is? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. My dear friend, I rather think you are, except on this subject.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The tariff is a subject that I have studied over more than any other subject. I will tell you what happened when both you and I were on the Ways and Means Committee when the Payne bill was under consideration. There were never but two men engaged in any protected industry that came in there and said that the tariff ought to be reduced—only two. And you folks had carried that election in 1908 on the proposition that you were going to reduce the tariff. There was a man who came in there, a tin-plate man, that seemed to me to be a very reasonable man——

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will.

Mr. FORDNEY. Is it not true that the Payne tariff law did reduce rates more than 25 per cent below the rates in the Dingley law?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No, sir. What happened was that the Payne bill raised the average tariff rate 1.71 per cent. I demonstrated that here on the floor of the House the day we discussed the conference report.

Mr. FORDNEY. If you will take the ad valorem rates under the Dingley bill you will find they average 26½ per cent and under the Payne law 18½ per cent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. On the day that we discussed the conference report on the tariff bill I proved that it raised the rates 1.71 per cent, and the Secretary of the Treasury adopted my figures. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is just exactly what he did. You people had an army of experts, and I had one poor schoolmaster from Arkansas that outfigured the whole crowd of them, and the Treasury adopted my figures. There was a tinplate manufacturer who came before that committee, and he said we should take one-half of a cent a pound off of tin; that we did not need it any more, and that in a few years we ought to take another half a cent off and leave the American tinplate manufacturer a differential of one-half a cent; that that was sufficient. He said when they started in the tinplate manufacturing they needed the cent and a half in order to get the American markets. Outside of that man, who seemed to be a candid man and a fair man and a good American, there was a man who was engaged in the scrap-iron business. He said there was no sense in the tariff on scrap iron. Outside of those two, every blessed man that came in there to testify wanted a raise in the tariff.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Did not Mr. Carnegie ask that steel products be put on the free list in the preparation of that bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have 10 minutes more.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, no; I do not want it. Is my time exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Kansas, I do not know as to Mr. Carnegie. I think he was there one day when I was not there. Somebody inveigled me to go down to North Carolina to make a speech.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. He was on his feet for eight hours, and underwent one of the most severe cross-examinations I ever heard a witness subjected to, and was cross-examined by Republicans. He was not in favor of a tariff on his product. He wanted to put it on the free list.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I did not happen to be there that day. I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] that we should produce in this country, if possible, articles needed in war, and the production of such articles should be encouraged, but the pending tungsten bill is protection run mad.

I will give you my opinion about this debate. This is in some features a very futile debate, and I feel that I really ought to apologize to the House for having taken any time on it myself. We have certain things that should be done in this Congress. We ought to do what we can to cut down the high cost of living. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why did not the Democratic Party get busy in 1913 on the high cost of living? It was an issue in 1912. This is all poppycock.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Maybe it is; but I will tell you what kind of poppycock it is. It will put all you fellows out if you do not attend to it. [Laughter.] That is true, just as certainly as you are alive.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman is speaking from experience? [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No. I am showing you what will happen to you. There will not be enough of you in the next Congress to demand the ayes and noes unless you cut down the high cost of living and relieve millions of men, women, and children from starvation. I think we ought to go to work and leave out the speech making and do what we can to relieve the distresses of the people of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is bootless to indulge in crimination and recrimination about it. Everybody knows that there is more than one element entering into the high cost of living. One of those elements is the expansion of the currency. There is no sense in anybody lying about it. Another element is these trusts, that have fixed up the prices of everything. Still another is the profiteers, and I have stated it over again several times that every profiteer in America ought to be put in the penitentiary. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will add one more sentence. I am in favor of quitting these extraneous debates and getting down to the work we are sent here to do. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON. I hope the gentleman will exercise his good offices among his colleagues on the other side to that end.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will, and also with oratorical Republicans.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, has only the first section of the bill been read, or have the first two sections?

The CHAIRMAN. The first section.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, far be it from me to enter into any line of parliamentary dispute with the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. Mr. Chairman, I do most heartily agree with him in the statement he makes that we had better get down to business and attend to the kind of business for which we are sent here. If I have sensed at all the sentiment of the times along that line, it is to do something for the American workingman. He can hardly from his day's pay make both ends meet, and that is one of the reasons for the passage of this very bill and for the passage of bills similar to it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Every time there is a word said here about any increase of tariff the picture that the leading Member on the Democratic side painted the other day, of somebody trembling, is presented, and that applies to the whole Democratic Party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] referred to an ancient game that is probably more common with the people of Missouri than with those of Massachusetts, and therefore naturally I plead great ignorance about the conditions under which that ancient game is played. But he said something about "raising" somebody else. He says that we are "raising" the duties provided for tungsten in the Payne-Aldrich bill, which was passed by the Republican Party when in the majority here. We are doing nothing of the kind. The Underwood bill came along and swept aside all duty on tungsten ore, and that is the condition that faces that industry to-day. There is no duty whatever on tungsten ore, and if we are raising the rate at all in this bill over the rate of the Payne-Aldrich bill, the reason for it is very clearly stated by Mr. F. C. Armstrong, the United States mineral surveyor, in his testimony at Denver. I am going to refer to this matter a moment later, but I want to refer to it particularly as applied to the statement of the gentleman from Missouri. Here is the reason, my friends, for this proposed increase in rates.

Mr. KITCHIN. What page?

Mr. TREADWAY. Page 82. I read:

> Mine labor, obtainable for $3 per day in 1914, now costs from $4.50 upward, and is not nearly so efficient.

There is the reason for any increase of rate in the present bill, namely, the rate of pay of the laborer has increased over 50 per cent, and we want to meet that increase. The Republican Party has always stood for proper wages for the workingmen.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. TREADWAY. No. The gentleman from Texas takes a great deal more time on the floor than I do and I decline to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. There is the reason, gentlemen, for the increase referred to in this bill.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. The testimony there is to the effect that there is an increase of 50 per cent in labor. I ask the gentleman the question if the increase of 100 per cent in the Payne bill is not sufficient to meet that?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Armstrong appeared before the United States Tariff Commission and estimated the actual increase in the cost of production from both of these causes at 100 per cent. That is the gist of his testimony. Similar testimony was given also by other witnesses. He says:

> In view of the increased cost of living, the higher wages are by no means unreasonable, but in connection with other elements of cost they are fast making a loss in the industry of mining.

That is the testimony of a United States official.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. If you increase the Payne-Aldrich rate 100 per cent, ought not that to reach the situation?

Mr. TREADWAY. No. We are faced by the situation left by the Democratic Underwood bill, with no tariff whatever on it.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; but I am taking the Payne bill rate and doubling it.

Mr. TREADWAY. You are talking about the Payne bill, which became a law in 1909, and this ore was not discovered in this country until 1900. Practically there was in this country no product at the time of the enactment of the Payne bill making the rate such as the gentleman from Texas is calling attention to now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLANTON. I object, if the gentleman can not yield to a civil question.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman was speaking on a pro forma amendment.

Mr. TREADWAY. No. I got unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Now I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How much time remains for debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The debate upon this paragraph has been exhausted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The debate is proceeding by unanimous consent, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted on this paragraph and has been proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. The debate having been exhausted, the gentleman from Massachusetts is out of order.

Mr. TREADWAY. I have made a new motion.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman can speak only by unanimous consent, and I object.

Mr. TREADWAY. I can speak on my motion.

Mr. BLANTON. I raise a point of order against that, the debate having been exhausted——

Mr. TREADWAY. The debate has not been exhausted on that motion, because it has never been started on that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to think that several gentlemen have spoken on that motion.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I raise a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled, and the gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORDNEY. In answer to the gentleman from Texas, I wish to call attention to the difference between an ad valorem duty and a specific duty. The gentleman from Texas said they were proposing to double the Payne rate. The Payne rate was 20 per cent on high-priced tungsten when valued at more than $200, 20 per cent ad valorem. When the price is what it is now, that amounts to $1.60 a unit; but when tungsten was selling at $90 a unit, it amounted to $1,800 a ton. Now, the ad valorem duty changes with the price of the article. A specific duty does not change. The duty provided for in this bill does not change, but an ad valorem duty changes as the price of the tungsten goes up or down. The ad valorem duty is unfair, because it fluctuates all the way from $1.60 a unit to $1,800 a ton.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think the gentleman from Michigan has several times explained that point, but naturally the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] does not wish to see it. There is no question about that. Now, I would like to get back to the consideration of the bill just for a moment. I commend to the members of the committee a careful perusal of the statement made by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE] and his colleague [Mr. VAILE]. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TIMBERLAKE] has already spoken, but if the members of the committee will read the statement and the memorandum which he submitted at the time of the hearing, and decide this question on its merits rather than on the false platform of what may be or may not be regarded as party policy here, but on the merits of the industry itself, they will vote unanimously for this bill.

And further let me commend to your consideration the statement by Mr. VAILE, also found in the hearing. I want to read to you just a very few sentences from that:

It will be remembered that when the United States entered the war the production of these minerals was at a very low ebb. Many causes doubtless contributed to this situation, but it was attributed by the producers chiefly to the absence of a protective tariff adequate to meet the ever-increasing cost of labor and materials.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the motion to strike out the last paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The gentleman from Massachusetts will confine himself to the motion.

Mr. TREADWAY. I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to read the statement made by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE], found on page 80 of the hearings, if he thinks it advisable to strike out the paragraph. This is the statement of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE]:

The tariff of 10 per cent ad valorem on tungsten had been removed prior to the war. In 1914 the United States had produced practically half of the tungsten consumed in this country, the imports coming chiefly from Australia, Portugal, and South America.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman is not speaking to his motion.

Mr. TREADWAY. I can make just as much noise as the gentleman from Texas can, and can speak just as long.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. TREADWAY. I will put my lungs up against his lungs at any time.

Mr. BLANTON. I raise the point of order that the gentleman should obey the ruling of the Chair and confine his argument to the paragraph.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] can not tell me what the ruling of the Chair is. He can impose on some people, but he can not impose on me.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas is going to see that the rules of the House are obeyed.

Mr. TREADWAY. I was a Member of this House before the gentleman from Texas came here, and will try to be here after the gentleman from Texas has gone.

Mr. BLANTON. You may be left at home.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will suspend. The point of order is well taken. The gentleman must confine himself to the motion before the House. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. TREADWAY. In reference to the motion to strike out the paragraph, I was reading from the statement of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE], as follows:

Through the competition of labor earning 50 cents per day in those countries, American producers were unable to compete with the mines of other countries, and when those mines were closed to us by lack of ocean transportation the United States suddenly found itself impelled to feverish haste in the attempted revival of the production of minerals absolutely essential to the making of armor plate and high-speed tools.

The entire statement of the gentleman [Mr. VAILE] is illuminating upon the subject and expresses the case very concisely. Coupled with the two statements of our colleagues from Colorado, the brief of the United States Tariff Commission, as found on page 70 of the hearings, makes the case complete and proves the need of the passage of this bill. It was my purpose to read further from the committee hearings, but the frequent interruptions have consumed the allotted time.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman is disobeying the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why did not the gentleman from Texas make the point of order against his own side?

Mr. BLANTON. Because the gentleman from Massachusetts declined to yield to me.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, the gentleman from Texas should be fair.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will be in order. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. KNUTSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts be given five minutes additional.

Mr. BLANTON. I object. He would not answer a civil question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. KNUTSON. We will not have any more Democratic speeches extended. I will promise you that.

Mr. BLANTON. You will have no more Minnesota speeches either.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. CALDWELL. A point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. CALDWELL. There was a motion made to strike out the paragraph, and I demand a vote on that motion.

Mr. TREADWAY. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. CALDWELL. I object to the withdrawal of the motion and demand a vote on it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. He can withdraw it at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. Then the question will recur upon the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. On the point of order, or, at least, a parliamentary inquiry. How can we go ahead and read the balance of the bill when a motion is pending to strike out the section?

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to close debate can be made at any time. After that motion is determined, then the question will recur on any pending motion as to the paragraph that has been read.

Mr. CALDWELL. I thank the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that debate on this paragraph be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I now withdraw the objection that I had to the gentleman's withdrawing his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts now withdraw the pro forma amendment?

Mr. CALDWELL. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I object to the amendment being withdrawn, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question then recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KITCHIN) there were—ayes 61, noes 97.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, on that I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. KITCHIN to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 90.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

First. Crude tungsten, ores, and concentrates, $10 per unit of tungsten trioxide therein contained, a unit being herein defined as 1 per cent of tungstic trioxide in a short ton of 2,000 pounds.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, strike out the word "tungsten" and insert the word "tungstic."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is willing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. I object. No; I withdraw the objection. I will not be so uncivil as that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the words "tungstic trioxide."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "pounds," insert the words "namely, 20 pounds of tungstic tricoxide."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I hope the membership of the committee will pay attention to what I am about to say. Day before yesterday in the discussion of the bill, and I repeated them again in my first remarks to-day, I made several statements with respect to this bill, and challenged denial then, and again repeated the challenge to-day. Not one of the statements I made has been denied, and I challenge again any Republican on the committee or in the House to deny a single one of them. We have had three or four speeches—I think four speeches—from members of the Ways and Means Committee, and not one member of the committee on the Republican side has disputed or denied a single one of those statements. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] arose, as it appeared, to accept the challenge, but instead of attempting a denial of any one of my statements proceeded in an attempt to show that I had misstated the facts with respect to another proposition. He said he wanted the Members of the House to consider "Mr. KITCHIN's statement after the hot air had been removed from it." I want to state exactly what the evidence shows. The gentleman said that I had asserted in my argument day before yesterday that producer after producer had demanded a tariff of $10 a unit on tungsten ore, and that, complying with such demand, $10 a unit tariff was put in. He then asked "why Mr. KITCHIN did not state the facts." He said that the truth is that only one interested person asked for a tariff of $10 a unit on the ore, and that that was Mr. McKenna, who, he said, was a manufacturer of ferrotungsten, not a producer of ore. I want to show that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] knows just as little about this bill and the evidence as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] or any other Republican on the committee or in this House [laughter], and how far from the fact he is.

Mr. Holmes, Mr. Bailey, and Mr. McKenna, all financially interested in the industry, appeared before the committee and demanded a tariff of $10 a unit. Look at the testimony—the gentleman has it in his hand—and if everyone that appeared of these interested manufacturers and producers did not demand $10 a unit, then I will vote for this bill.

Not only that, but turn to page 6 of the hearings and you will find there a brief prepared by the manufacturers for my friend, Mr. TIMBERLAKE, in which they demand $10 a unit. Yet he says that the only man financially interested who asked for a tariff of $10 a unit was Mr. McKenna. Turn to Mr. Holmes's testimany, pages 16 to 27. He is the secretary and treasurer of the Tungsten Products Co. He came here in the interest of this bill. Turn to page 10 and you will find a telegram addressed to Mr. TIMBERLAKE, which he introduced in evidence, signed by 21 corporation producers of tungsten ore, all, no doubt, controlled in the matter by the big four, demanding that we put in this bill a tariff of $10 per unit. Yet he says that nobody interested but Mr. McKenna asked that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. For just a question. I have only five minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman has not stated it strong enough. I said that Mr. McKenna was a consumer and user of the material, and these 21 people that you are talking about did not appear before the committee at all.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; but they sent this telegram for the committee and it was read to the committee. Turn to pages 16 and 17 and you will find a telegram from the Standard Tungsten Co., another from the Cooper-Chaley Co., another from the Pine Creek Tungsten Co., and another from the Tungsten Reef Mines Co., all asking for the tariff of $10 a unit. Yet the gentleman says that I did not state the fact when I stated that the producers of ore asked for the very tariff written in this bill, because, he says, only one man interested asked for it. So I repeat that the producers did demand before our committee the $10 a unit tariff and that the Republican members put their demands in the bill without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t."

Mr. GREEN in his speech declared that in preparing this bill instead of taking the testimony of interested witnesses they had the Tariff Commission report before them, that in preparing the bill they had Mr. Riddell's testimony before them, and that by such report and by such testimony they prepared the bill. Gentlemen, here is the bill and the report of the Tariff Commission. The Tariff Commission did not report until June 14. No Member saw it before then. Yet the bill carrying out to the letter the demands of its beneficiaries—the tungsten-ore producers—was introduced on June 2, 12 days before the Tariff Commission had even reported. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object, because objection was made to giving Mr. TREADWAY more time.

Mr. TREADWAY. I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will not object, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from Texas sees now how it works out. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, they said in preparing this bill that they took Mr. Riddell's testimony. The bill was prepared and introduced with the exact rates which it now contains 10 days before Mr. Riddell appeared before the committee. [Applause on the Democratic side.] His testimony was given on June 13. Here is the bill, $10 a unit for ore, $1 a pound for the metallic tungsten, introduced on June 2, 11 days before they knew there was such a man living as Riddell. They only took disinterested testimony they say. Riddell's testimony shows that he took his opinion as to the rates from what the manufacturers wanted and what they told him they wanted. He said that is what the manufacturers claimed they ought to have to protect themselves.

The Tariff Commission's report does not justify this bill, nor is there a word or a line in the Tariff Commission's report that states that there should be $10 a unit on ore, or $1 a pound on the ferrotungsten; not one word. And yet they would have the House and country believe that this bill was proposed on the Tariff Commission's report and Riddell's testimony. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] said that he was going to answer the statements which I challenged the Republicans to deny. Not an answer or denial of any of them did he make, because he could not answer or deny them. Neither did Mr. FORDNEY. Instead of denying or answering what I said and letting this House know of the outrageously high and excessive rates in the bill, why, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] made a discourse of 31 minutes on the tariff on lemons and the lawsuit on lemons five years ago. What did lemons and the lawsuit have to do with tungsten ore and this bill? Both the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] talked about everything except the bill—not one word about the bill. Neither denied the statements I made though challenged day before yesterday and to-day to deny any one of them. Why? Because they could not answer or deny them. They did not want you Republicans here to know what is in their bill, so they talked on subjects not connected with the bill. Then Mr. MONDELL, the majority leader, recognizing that if these new Members knew what was in this bill, that if the Members on that side who did not know the old ring and machine were informed of these rates and their effect, if they were convinced that what I said of the bill was true, they could not vote for it, take the floor or to divert their minds from the bill, and without referring to a line or word on the bill, without mentioning what the rates are, without mentioning what huge increases the bill makes, or the monopoly it serves, delivered a beautiful declamation on Bourbonism for 20 minutes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I said in my remarks Tuesday that not a Republican member of the committee or of the House knew how much 60 per cent tungsten ore it takes to make a ton of tungsten or ferrotungsten. I paused to give them time to answer, and not one answered. I declared then, as I do now, that no man can tell whether a dollar a pound on tungsten or ferrotungsten is a proper or just compensatory duty unless he knows how much 60 per cent tungsten ore it takes to make a pound or ton of ferrotungsten, because that duty is supposed to be levied for the purpose of compensating for the duty levied on tungsten ore. But since Tuesday some one presuming to know more about it than the Republican members of the committee and the House has undertaken to tell them. So this morning they come in here and say that it takes 2½ tons of tungsten 60 per cent ore to make a ton of tungsten or ferrotungsten. This is not correct. According to Mr. McKenna's testimony, it takes 4,167 pounds of such ore to make a ton of ferrotungsten; that is a fraction over 2 tons. But where is the Tariff Board report? Turn to page 36 of the Tariff Commission's report. It states that it takes only 2 tons of 60 per cent tungsten ore to make 1 ton of ferrotungsten.

The Geological Survey, the War Industries Board, and the Department of Commerce agree on the 2 tons of ore for 1 ton of ferrotungsten. So then, that being true, just as I said—I gave it the benefit of 100 pounds in my statement day before yesterday—if it takes 2 tons of tunsten ore to make 1 ton of ferrotungsten, then this compensatory duty, instead of being $2,000 a ton, ought only to be $1,200 a ton, or 60 cents a pound, and this bill with this joker of $1 a pound gives to the tungsten manufacturer a clear extra $800 a ton. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and section be now closed.

Mr. KITCHIN. One minute; I desire to offer an amendment.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is now closed. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KITCHIN: Page 1, line 8, after the word "First," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof "tungsten-bearing ores of all kinds, 10 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the exact language of the Payne-Aldrich Act.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 97.

Mr. KITCHIN. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. GARNER took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes 104.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment that I wish to offer there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHIN: Page 1, line 8, after the word "First," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof: "tungsten-bearing ores of all kinds, 20 per cent ad valorem."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 104, noes 109.

Mr. KITCHIN. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. GARNER took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 113, noes 113.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second. Metallic tungsten, tungsten powder, ferrotungsten (lump and pulverized), ferrotungsten powder, commercial tungstic acid, calcium tungstate, sodium tungstate, and all other salts of tungsten and other manufactured materials containing tungsten, including high-speed tungsten steel, all alloy steels containing tungsten, and all other compounds containing tungsten not specifically provided for in this section, $1 per pound of tungsten contained therein.

Mr. KITCHIN, Mr. FORDNEY, Mr. DEWALT, and Mr. GREEN of Iowa rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have an amendment to offer, but I wish to offer it as a new section. If the gentleman from North Carolina has an amendment to the section, I will withhold my amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have an amendment to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KITCHIN: Page 2, line 3, after the word "Second," strike out all of the paragraph and insert:

"Tungsten, tungsten powder, ferrotungsten (lump and pulverized), and ferrotungsten powder, 20 per cent ad valorem."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to debate that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I object to striking out the last word. The gentleman can talk on the amendment.

Mr. FORDNEY. All right. The amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] practically puts all grades of tungsten on the same basis and under the same rate of duty. That would in no sense be a fair provision of law. But any amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina is intended to destroy the effect of this bill reported by the Republicans. I warn you gentlemen of the House to that effect. He has no purpose whatever other than to destroy a Republican measure. But to put the same rate of duty on a low-grade ore that is imposed on high-grade ore is not common sense, let alone being just and equitable.

In committee the gentleman opposed any rate of duty on tungsten ore or on tungsten metal. I wish to repeat to the gentlemen of the House that tungsten is one of the most important metals in use in the land this minute, and most important because it is used in making high-speed steel, which steel makes it possible to speed up the work in constructing ships, locomotives, and machinery of every description.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. It is also used in the tools that are necessary for turning out the cannon and other war material that this country requires.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. High-speed tool steel is made possible only by the use of tungsten. The Government, recognizing the extreme importance of tungsten, encouraged its production in America during the war by proposing to use a portion of the $50,000,000 appropriation for the encouragement of the production of certain so-called war minerals that were much needed and which we could not get abroad. Let me say to some of you gentlemen, who may not have been here a few minutes ago and heard what I said about the fluctuating price of tungsten, that it was shown by an expert who appeared before the committee that tungsten ore, 60 per cent metallic content, can be and is now being furnished to the English Government from some of their colonies at $1.92 a unit, whereas the producers in this country who began the industry during the war to help out our Government, to help win this war, closed their mines and their factories when the price went down to $17 a unit. That indicates the difference in the cost of production in this country and abroad. The mines from which tungsten ore is taken to-day in the United States, as I now remember it, as expert testimony taken by our committee shows, contain tungsten in veins averaging about 4 inches thick, and a very large amount of rock must be taken from the earth to give space for the miners to work in and get that tungsten ore, whereas in China, whence a large portion of the tungsten ore comes now, it is picked up largely from the surface by unskilled labor.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And as the gentleman is aware, the price for it now, put down in New York, is from $6 to $8 per unit, and this amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina would probably allow it to be sold for $8 per unit.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. Tungsten is sold in this country for $7 a unit. It was sold for $90 during the war, when we were obliged to go to foreign countries for what we needed.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have given very little consideration to the details of this legislation, but I think there is a misapprehension as to what the effect of the section before us will be on the industry. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], if I understand his amendment correctly, proposes, instead of a specific rate of duty, that we shall have a 20 per cent ad valorem rate. Now, if I understand the effect of an ad valorem rate of 20 per cent on the price of the commodity, it would mean $1,800 a ton in some instances, whereas the specific rate proposed by the committee and carried in this section of the bill would not carry more than $1,000 a ton. I wonder if I am right?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman wish to inquire of the committee?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is right in one way and in another way he is not. The effect of this amendment, which is entirely inconsistent with the first paragraph of the bill, would be to wipe out not only the provisions of the second section, which he proposes to strike out, but it would also wipe out certain provisions of the first section. The first section levies a rate of about $600 per ton on tungstic trioxide. The gentleman is mixing up the ore and the concentrated product so much that it is impossible to state it in a few minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. At any rate, it would run it up as high as $1,800 a ton, whereas in no case would it run beyond $1,000 under the provision of the bill.

Gentlemen, let us understand the purpose of the gentleman from North Carolina. His purpose is to embarrass the situation. He is a free-trade Democrat. He does not believe in protecting American industry for American workingmen or American capital. We believe that American industry should be protected and developed by Americans. [Applause on the Republican side.] He, on the other hand, believes in a tariff for revenue only, without any incidental protection whatever. He does not care where the material comes from, even though it may be produced by Chinese or Japanese labor at the expense of American labor. We do. We want to employ American labor at American wages. [Applause on the Republican side.] We want to develop American industry by American hands and American capital, and he would put into competition with these men in America the underpaid labor of India, of Japan, of China, anywhere in all the world.

Why, when we were considering the Underwood bill I asked Mr. UNDERWOOD, the able chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means then, if certain things happened what would become of American industry, and he said he was not concerned and neither was the Democratic Party concerned about American industry. They were concerned in opening the markets of America to competition with the world. We, as Republicans, are in favor of maintaining the American market for America and Americans. That is the difference. [Applause on the Republican side.]

So that you must not misunderstand the attitude of the gentleman from North Carolina. We must realize that we speak for one element of progress, and that element is America, while he speaks for an element represented by Woodrow Wilson, called "world humanity." We are not interested in it. [Applause on the Republican side.] We are interested in America and Americans, and we are for America first, and for the development of its industries and the maintenance of its prosperity and the happiness of its people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak to the amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman favors the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, of course we are all delighted, at all times, to hear gentlemen on the other side of the aisle proclaiming their great interest in the protection of American labor. Permit me to say that I come from a State having at least ten millions of inhabitants, largely industrial, and probably embracing as many laboring men to the square mile as any other portion of the United States.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. And they vote for protection.

Mr. DEWALT. Permit me also to say that I yield to no man on either side of the House in my desire to protect American labor against unfair competition and the cheap labor of foreign climes. [Applause.] In so far as that goes, I am a protectionist, but I never will be a protectionist for a particular class and for a particular section. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The great trouble in this proposition, at this time, seems to be that the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle are more concerned in the welfare of a paricular State and the mines in that State producing tungsten than they are concerned in the prosperity of the entire Union. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Is the reason for that concern this, that in 1920 that particular State will be a pivotal State, and they are now electioneering for the vote of that Commonwealth? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SNYDER. We will get it all right.

Mr. DEWALT. Permit me to say that this is entirely, in my judgment, what you call local legislation. Let me show you. The very report in itself shows that there were 22 companies formerly producing this material; that they had $2,000,000 invested in tungsten mines and $1,000,000 in 21 concentrating mills; and that the entire revenue which could be obtained by this tariff would amount to only $1,800,000. I come from a district where there are in one manufacturing establishment of finished steel products 30,000 workmen instead of 5,000. [Applause.] I come from a district where there are at least 230,000 people working in the steel mills, the cement mills, and in the factories producing the other products which go into the prosperity of this country, and gentlemen on that side of the aisle propose now to legislate for a pocket-borough State, having a population less than one-fifth of that of Pennsylvania, and to protect an industry that is employing only 5,000 men. It seems to me then, my friends, that it comes with very poor grace on the part of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to proclaim his loyalty and his devotion to American labor. [Applause.] Why does he not talk about the American labor of Illinois? Why does he not talk about the American labor of Pennsylvania and its protection?

Mr. VAILE. Let me suggest to the gentleman that the Members on this side of the House believe in local legislation of a sort that can be supported in any part of the United States, not in local legislation that some Democratic Member may support for his own district. [Applause.]

Mr. DEWALT. I never saw a more flat contradiction of that statement than there is in this very bill itself. [Applause.] The very report shows that you are legislating for only 5,000 workmen, that you are legislating for only 22 manufacturing establishments, and that the revenue you get from it will be the meager sum of $1,800,000, while the tax you put on the steel industry, taking your own figures of 15 cents per ton, taking the thousands of millions of tons of steel products that are manufactured in this country, would amount to a thousand times more than your $1,800,000.

Mr. VAILE. Let me ask the gentleman if he is speaking for his side of the House, or only for himself, when he advocates the protection only of industries which are large?

Mr. DEWALT. I think I am speaking for the general public welfare, as I always try to do, against private interests and monopoly. [Applause.] And I assert here——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEWALT. And I assert, after listening to the discussion on both sides of the aisle in reference to this bill, that it shows upon the face of it that it must have been conceived, promulgated, and used entirely for the interest of this particular industry. Now, if this was an infant industry, if this was an industry that spread its efforts all over the United States, if various portions of the country needed this particular protection, I would be glad to vote for a bill of this kind within reasonable limits; but when they propose to put a tariff tax upon a product of this kind, when it is shown clearly that only 5,000 people are engaged in it, and that only 22 manufacturing establishments are producing it, and that the revenue to be obtained by the tax on the foreign product will be only $1,800,000, and in the same breath they determine to raise this tariff to at least three times as much or twice as much as the Payne-Aldrich tariff, then I, as a citizen of Pennsylvania and as a citizen of the Union, protest against the iniquity and inequality thereof. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, my fellow Republicans, the new ones especially [laughter], all those who do not know the old ring as well as I do, let me ask you, have you not got sense enought to know that Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. MADDEN and every other gentleman who has spoken on this floor against this amendment knows absolutely that this bill is without merit? Have you heard them mention this bill? Have you heard any of them discuss a single provision of this bill? Has any one of them told you of the huge increase of the tariff in this bill over any tariff that was ever written into a bill? Have you heard a single one of them tell what the equivalent ad valorem of these rates would be, or how it would increase the price, or whether the industry "protected" in the bill is a monopoly or not, or where a monopoly is going to get the whole benefit of this bill, or how much it will add to the costs of the steel tools, or how much money is going to be taken from the people by the bill and given to the "big four"? But as an argument on the merits of the bill Mr. FORDNEY says, "Fellow Republicans, you ought not to vote for this amendment because a Democrat offers it, and if you vote for this amendment you will be killing"—not a just bill, not a righteous bill, not a fair bill, but—"a Republican bill." [Applause.] And Mr. MADDEN tells you that this amendment comes from "Mr. KITCHIN, a free trader." Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. MADDEN tell you that the amendment is unjust without knowing what it is. They only know that a "Democrat offers it." They tell you that this amendment is unfair. Ah, gentlemen, I never expected to hear Mr. FORDNEY or Mr. MADDEN come before the House and denounce as unjust or unfair any part of the Payne-Aldrich Act. This amendment of mine is an exact copy of the Payne Act itself with respect to this industry. [Laughter.] Now, do you mean to say that the Payne Act provision was unjust, was unfair, was a sham, and that it ought to be voted out because Democrats now present it for your consideration and vote? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman vote for this bill if this amendment carries?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will vote for this bill if this amendment and the others putting in the provisions of the Payne act pass. I will not vote for this bill with this amendment alone, but I propose, as I told you this morning, to offer amendments putting the Payne Act rates in every one of these sections in lieu of the rates now in them. Yes; I will vote for this bill if you restore the Payne Act rates. [Applause.] Because they are five times better than the bill as it is. Now, let me ask you, if this amendment and other amendments carry, which put back the Payne Act rates just as you then voted, just as Mr. FORDNEY voted, and just as the other Republicans voted when it was enacted, will you repudiate these rates and provisions of the Payne Act, or will you vote with me for them? [Applause.] What will you do? Approve or repudiate?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Answer!

Mr. KITCHIN. I told you they did not know anything about the Payne tariff. I told you they did not know anything about this bill. They just took what the manufacturers wanted, in the Payne Act as in this bill. Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. MONDELL and Mr. MADDEN and these other Republicans did not know that my amendment was the Payne Act provision exactly. [Applause and laughter on Democratic side.] But it must be repudiated, however, because it comes from me, a Democrat. If it had come from Mr. Payne, they would say that it was a model of perfection. They did not know anything about the Payne Act when they voted for it. They did exactly as they are doing now. They did what the manufacturers throughout the country ordered them to do, just like they are doing what four corporations demand on this bill. [Applause and laughter on Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY says that my amendment is unjust because it is an ad valorem rate. The Payne Act was an ad valorem rate exactly like this amendment, "20 per cent ad valorem." Mr. MADDEN says that an ad valorem rate puts a higher tax upon it than a specific tax. This ad valorem tariff of the Payne Act proposed in my amendment will put a tariff tax equal to $226 a ton, and the specific tariff proposed in this bill before you put a tariff tax of $2,000 a ton, and this in addition to the 15 per cent tariff. Here is a chance for you Republicans to do a fair and just thing. He says that you ought to vote against my amendment because it will raise the tax, and vote for their bill because it will lower the tax. You are asked, therefore, to vote for the lower tax. If you do you will vote for my amendment, for the rate, the tax in the bill, is over 800 per cent or over nine times higher than the rate or tax in my amendment, which is the Payne rate on tons. This tariff bill which they report is twice as high as any bill that was ever presented by a committee to this House since the very beginning of the Government, and I defy any Republican to deny it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FESS rose.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman who has just left the floor [Mr. KITCHIN] is not only facetious but the inconsistency of the position that he took in 1909 and in 1913 with the position that he is taking now is sufficient to call attention to it. In 1909 he harangued the House with all of the power of his forensic ability against the Payne law. In 1913 he went upon the floor of the House with all of the power that he possessed, advocated superseding the Payne law by the Underwood law, which, of course, did away with all of the protection on this item that was in the Payne law, and now he comes on the floor of the House following the Republican idea and undertakes to cover it up by saying that because the Republican side of the House voted for it in 1909 and against the Underwood law in 1913 they ought now to accept it because he offers it in 1919. That shows the consistency of the position that he has taken. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] says that he is for protection when it is nation-wide, but not for protection when it is local. Let me say to the gentleman that when he votes to protect an article, no matter how limited it is in its geography, in its production, which is used universally in its application, it ceases to be a local interest and becomes a nation-wide interest. The gentleman goes on to say that he will not stand for this bill because it applies to a small interest. Let me say to the gentleman——

Mr. DEWALT rose.

Mr. FESS. I can not yield now. Let me say to my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], speaking as he says he does for the steel industry of his famous district—one of the greatest districts in the United States—that the steel industry in the State for which he speaks is what it is now because of the genius of the protective tariff which put the steel industry on its feet in America. [Applause on the Republican side.] And he did not stand for it then. To-day when the steel industry has gotten to the position where it does not need any particular legislation to support it, the gentleman comes and admits that he would be for protection if it was for a large production like the steel of the country, but he will not be for it if it is for tungsten that comes from some particular locality. Let me say to my friend from Pennsylvania, speaking as he does, insinuating that this legislation is to win the State of Colorado for the Republican side of the House, that that job has already been done. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is no necessity for anything of that sort. I rise simply to say this, that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] specifically differentiate between the Republican policy and the Democratic policy by their speaking for tungsten in the interest of the labor of China, Bolivia, and Portugal, the countries that are in competition with America, and that we speak not for Colorado alone but for the United States of America, in order to maintain American standard of wages and American standard of living as against European competition. [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this amendment now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The question was taken.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. GARNER to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 118, noes 140.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman has another amendment, I will withhold mine until he can offer his.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHIN: Page 2, line 3, after the word "Second," strike out all of the paragraph and insert:

"Tungsten, tungsten powder, ferrotungsten (lump and pulverized), and ferrotungsten powder, 25 per cent ad valorem."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes on this amendment. I did not know that debate was closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, since it appeared in the discussion of my last amendment that the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee and of the House knew nothing about the Payne Act and its provisions and its rates, I want to inform them that the amendment now proposed by me, with the rate of the existing law, exactly doubles the Payne Act rate on ferrotungsten and tungsten. The existing law on tungsten and articles covered in section 2 is 15 per cent. I now offer an amendment to add to that 25 per cent, which makes 40 per cent, and that is twice as high as the Payne Act rate. Even this high rate is less than one-fourth as high as the rate or tariff in the bill before us. I am giving by this amendment a chance for the Republicans to show some respect for the general interest rather than bestow it all on the special interests.

I want to say if the Republicans of this House are willing to vote for a rate twice as high as the Payne rate, and the Republican leaders and machine here ask you to vote against it, they admit that the rate in the bill before you is, as I said, many times—over nine times—higher than the Payne Act rate. The rate of the bill, as I have frequently stated, is $2,000 a ton, plus the 15 per cent duty under existing law, while in 1911, 1912, and 1913, under the Payne Act, the rate was 20 per cent ad valorem, which made it, at normal prices prevailing, equivalent to $226 a ton, as against $2,169 a ton, being the $2,000 per ton specific duty—$1 per pound—plus the 15 per cent ad valorem, which equals $169 per ton. Now, I make the Payne rate double. This will be 40 per cent, or the equivalent, on basis of the normal price, of $452 per ton. I call attention again to the fact that no Republican who has entered this discussion has referred to the provisions of this bill or to its rates or to its operation. But the House machine call in all of the old-time political war horses and snap the lash over the heads of these new Members and intimidate them into voting for this outrage. They had a committee, an able and distinguished committee, which ought to have been intelligent and patriotic enough to take care of this bill on the floor if it was worthy of being taken care of.

First they put the author of the bill up, and he is the only Republican who has discussed the bill. He made as fine an explanation of and argument for it as could be made for such a bill. Then they called upon the chairman, who is not interested in this one way or the other, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, one of the most influential Members here, one of the most partisan Members here, and he appealed to you on the ground not that this bill was right or just but that this was a "Republican bill" reported out by a "Republican committee," and that Republicans of the House ought not to let Democrats kill or amend it. Then they called upon the distinguished majority leader [Mr. MONDELL], who did not discuss the bill, and for good reasons—he knew absolutely nothing about the bill or any of its provisions. The only thing he knew was that it was a "Republican bill." That was not sufficient. After the speeches of Mr. MONDELL and Mr. FORDNEY a vote was taken on an amendment and it stood 104 to 102. They sent then over to the headquarters of the Republican congressional committee and brought in the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], the chairman of the Republican national congressional committee, and had him appeal to all Republicans to save a "Republican bill" from being destroyed or changed by a Democratic amendment. Not that my amendment was not right, not that my amendment was not just, not that my amendment was not the proper and patriotic thing, but that my amendment was proposed by a Democrat against a "Republican bill." Gentlemen, this amendment is twice as high as the Payne Act rate. Now, let us see how you will vote on that.

I desire to call attention to one remark of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. That remark was this: "Why," he said, "the difference between our party and the Democratic Party is that we have legislated for the American laborer, while they want to legislate for the foreign Chinese laborer," and so forth. Remember, my amendment, which called forth this partisan ebulition, was exactly the Payne Act provision. I will say to the gentleman that if my amendment legislates against American labor in favor of Chinese labor, then the Republican Party has the honor of preceding the Democrats 10 years in legislating against the American laborer in favor of the Chinese and foreign laborer when in 1909 it passed the very provision contained in my amendment. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in my remarks of a few moments ago gentlemen may have understood me to refer to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] as a Bourbon. I referred to a Bourbon as one who never learns. Well, I shall have to modify that a little, if it is to be assumed I included the gentleman from North Carolina in my reference. The gentleman from North Carolina, it seems, is not such a Bourbon as I may have thought he was. He does learn a little. The truth is, he learns slowly and does not keep up with the progress of truth and the march of events. He was against the Payne-Aldrich bill and denounced all of its provisions as the sum of all iniquities. He has now advanced to the point where he at least offers an amendment for a tariff rate which he says is twice as high as the Payne-Aldrich rate, which, in his opinion, was anathema. So the gentleman has progressed. The Democratic leader has moved forward just a little. The trouble with him is that he has not come to a full understanding of the truth. In the days of the Payne-Aldrich bill we had not learned, any of us, of the importance of these key industries; we had not, any of us, realized the unfortunate condition of the country in time of war with a monopoly of essential elements in the hands of the enemy, and so in the Payne bill we placed on tungsten not a rate intended to develop the American industry to a point to make it commanding and Nation supplying but rather a small but somewhat encouraging rate. But we have learned something during the war, on our side, and I trust that the gentlemen on that side have, if their leaders have not, and that is that as to the essential elements and industries America must be made independent of all the world. [Applause on the Republican side.] We must prepare to protect ourselves from foreign monopoly and against the day when, if foreign nations shall withhold from us those things needful for our very existence, we shall have developed them within our own borders to an extent to enable us to become independent of all the world. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is what this rate means. Not what the comparatively low rate of the Payne bill meant, simply reasonable encouragement to an American industry to allow it to continue to exist in a limited way, but a rate, based on the judgment of those who know best of the conditions to be met, calculated to make America largely independent of all the world in these elements and in these lines of production as we hope before we conclude our labors to make her similarly independent in other essential lines. [Applause on the Republican side and cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on this amendment be closed in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has already been closed.

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen on this side also have five minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I object to both requests; let us vote.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do not do that.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made to both requests. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Division, Mr. Speaker. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. GARNER took their places as tellers.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 120, noes 137.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. This is an amendment in the shape of a new section.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have another amendment I wish to offer.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I thought the gentleman was through. I withdraw my amendment for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHIN: Page 2, line 10, strike out "$1" and insert in lieu thereof "62½ cents."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. One minute, Mr. Chairman. Do the gentlemen want any explanation of that? [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, a division; and I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 114, noes 138.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the form of a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 2, after line 10, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 2. That there shall be levied, assessed, and collected upon all tungsten ore and concentrates which have been imported prior to the passage of this act from any foreign country and held or kept within the United States, when such ore has been purchased by the owner thereof at a price less than $17 per unit of tungsten trioxide therein contained, a tax equal to the difference between the purchase price so paid by the owner and the price named above in this section."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak a word in explanation of the amendment. This amendment is satisfactory to the members of the committee on this side, and I think will be satisfactory to the members of the committee on the other side, although I have not heard them express any opinion with reference to it.

The committee will remember that there has been much said with reference to the amount of ore which was already held in stock at New York, especially by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] with reference to $3,000,000 being made by the owners thereof. I undertook to show, and think I did show, that the owners would not make anything, but might possibly recoup their loss. In any event, this amendment would take care of that situation.

And there is also another situation that should be taken care of. It will probably be some time before this bill will pass the Senate. Ore is coming in here now—at least offered for sale—at the rate of about $7 or $8, and I think there has been a claim that some ore has been offered as low as $6 per unit of tungsten trioxide laid down at New York. The effect of this bill, as the committee intended it, will be to bring the price up to about $17 per unit, which is the lowest price, under the testimony, at which the American operators could produce it. Under my amendment these men that have these large stocks on hand, if they bought it for less than $17 per unit, will be compelled to pay a tax on the difference between what they paid for it and $17, and there will be no object in trying to ship in, as doubtless otherwise there would be imported, large quantities of the ore at somewhere from $6 to $8 a unit, with the hope of making the difference between that and the rate in this bill during the time this bill was pending. That is the object of the amendment, and I think there will be no objection thereto.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman states that it will probably be some time before this bill is passed by the Senate. How long does he think it will be before it is signed by the President?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It depends on whether the President adheres to his message, which he recently sent us, in which he called attention to matters of this kind—these war minerals—and said that they ought to be protected. I have high hopes that the President, as well as some of the gentlemen on the other side, is learning as the time goes on.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman knows there is not any chance on earth of the President signing this bill, and, of course, the gentleman, as well as that side, knows it will not be passed by a two-thirds vote over his veto. So why are we consuming so much time in the consideration of these popgun bills when everybody knows there is not the slightest chance of any of them becoming law?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. May I ask, then, why the other side is taking so much time?

Mr. LITTLE. Perhaps the gentleman from Oklahoma could tell us whether the President would sign the bill if we would double the Payne tariff rates?

Mr. GARNER. The testimony before us showed, so far as the consumption of this country is concerned, that there is only three years' supply in existence in this country.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is simply making a statement. He is like the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], who said we did not deny certain statements, although it was proven over and over again in the hearings that they were not correct.

Mr. GARNER. I think the gentleman will find from the Bureau of Mines the testimony that the amount in sight now would be sufficient to run this country for three years, but that they hoped and believed in the course of the production of this ore a great deal more of it would be discovered. And I think that is a reasonable hypothesis. I think this Government itself ought to buy and own a certain amount of this ore in case of an emergency. I think it ought to have it in this country, and own it and have it laid away and stored in case of war or emergency, because it is just possible, if not probable, that in this country this tungsten ore will be exhausted, and unless we erect the industry ourselves and have some of that article in case of emergency we may be caught where we can not get this tungsten at all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think that will occur at all. In that connection I want to refer to a statement made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] repeatedly. He said that nobody denied that this bill would create a monopoly. His own statement shows that it could not create a monopoly. One firm have produced in the past 25 per cent, another 60 per cent, or something of that kind, but those concerns are not producing at that rate now. There are hundreds of little producers that make up a large proportion of what is produced, and if this bill passes we put the rate so low that at least one-half of it will come from abroad. And as to the Payne tariff rates one might as well talk about the rates before the Civil War, conditions are so different. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that the gentleman from Iowa offered this amendment. I shall not oppose this amendment, because I am certain that this bill will pass just as the manufacturers want it and just as the Republicans reported it out of the committee. This amendment would improve the bill. If we were not certain that you are going to pass the bill in this House this proposition standing alone would be a shame and injustice; but as the bill is, it betters it to some extent.

Here is the gratification that I have over the introduction of the amendment: It is an admission of the truth of what I said the other day. If my statement was not true it would not be necessary to have this amendment and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] would not have introduced it.

Dr. Hess, of the Geological Survey, testified before our committee, and it was not denied by anybody then, and it has not been denied by anybody since, that there had been imported by four firms in New York 4,500 tons of ore, most of it from China, and that it was stored and held there now; that the producers in this country had stored 1,500 tons. I said that if this bill were passed it would at once advance the price of that ore $600 per ton and would put into the pockets of these four importers by such advance $2,700,000; that it would increase the value or price of the 1,500 tons held by the producers $900,000 and they would pocket that amount extra. I challenged then and to-day a denial. No denial has been forthcoming, but an admission in the shape of this amendment.

The gentleman recognized that that would be the result of this bill, and this amendment is offered to keep those importers or other importers who imported at $8 or $9 or $10 per unit from making the extra $600 a ton which this bill otherwise would give. They would not have offered this amendment if I had not called their attention to that fact. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] asserted awhile ago that I had made statements that were "disproved by the hearings time and time again." It is mighty easy to make statements, gentlemen, but it is mighty hard to prove them when you are face to face with the other fellow and he has all the evidence in his hand. I challenge the gentleman right now to restate one statement that I made, and then point to one line or word in the Tariff Commission report, or one line or word in all the hearings, from any of the witnesses that disproves a single statement I made. I challenge him to do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Why, the gentleman could not even state the rate of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill correctly, and he can not state it now.

Mr. KITCHIN. What was the rate? Tell it if you know.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Twenty-five per cent on any under $200 and 20 per cent on any over $200.

Mr. KITCHIN. That was on tungsten and ferrotungsten. We were just discussing ore, but just think what a stickler the gentleman is! The Payne Act did read so, because the McKinley Act or the Dingley Act made such a distinction. It did read that all tungsten or ferrotungsten valued at $200 per ton or under would bear 25 per cent duty, and all valued at over $200 per ton should bear 20 per cent duty. Now, there has not been one single ton or pound of tungsten or ferrotungsten imported in this country in the last 20 years that was valued at less than $200 per ton. The gentleman should know it. He can not show me from the statistics where a ton or a pound of tungsten or ferrotungsten has come in at less than $200. If he can show that I will promise to vote for this bill. But it is not there.

As I said, the gentleman did not know that no tungsten or ferrotungsten was valued at $200 or less. He did not know that the 25 per cent on tungsten or ferrotungsten had been a dead and useless provision in the act ever since it was passed, because if he had it would be foolish in the face of a knowledge of the facts to have made such an assertion; but he did not know any better. [Laughter.] So that the real tariff rate under the Payne Act was just as I said it was, 20 per cent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, if the gentleman has any other instance wherein he is willing to allege that I made a misstatement, I challenge him now to declare it. I pause for him to do so. He declines because he knows every statement I made on Tuesday and I have made to-day in respect to this bill is absolutely true. [Applause on the Democratic side, and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the provisions of this act shall not be deemed to repeal any tariff now existing upon any substances or materials mentioned in this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] to the fact that the amendment just adopted was a new section and numbered 2. The section we are now considering in the bill is No. 2, and it is necessary, therefore, to change it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the present section be numbered 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FORDNEY: On page 2, line 11, after the word "Section," strike out the figure "2" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "3."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KITCHIN: Page 2, line 3, strike out all of section 3 and insert as section 3 "That the provisions of any act inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the amendment I propose strikes out the provision in the bill which makes the tariff rates in the bill an addition to the existing duty under the present law on tungsten and ferrotungsten, and so forth. The duty is now 15 per cent, and this provision is so written in the bill that that duty remains, and if the bill becomes a law we will have both the existing of 15 per cent and the exorbitant duties in the bill. That is, we will have the tariff of $2,000 a ton on ferrotungsten and tungsten provided in the bill, plus 15 per cent ad valorem. This amendment is to strike out section 3 containing the provision and insert in lieu thereof the usual section repealing the provisions of any law inconsistent with this bill, so as to give its beneficiaries only the $2,000 per ton robbery. This alone amounts to over 175 per cent.

Gentlemen of the committee, in a few minutes we are going to vote on this bill. It is going to pass. All Democrats shall vote against it. Before the vote on the bill I shall offer an amendment to recommit, striking out these rates and submitting the Payne-Aldrich Act rates, which will test your loyalty to that act. The day before yesterday and this morning I made the statement, and I repeat it now, that this bill gives $5,000,000 annually to four corporations which have a monopoly of the industry. Not a man has denied it and not one can deny it. I have dared one to deny it. I charged that this bill imposed a duty upon ore 1,100 per cent higher than the Payne Act—twelve times as high. I challenged them to deny it. They did not deny it. They could not deny it. They do not deny it now. I challenged that on tungsten and ferrotungsten the rate was over 800 per cent higher than the Payne rate—over nine times as high. I challenged the Republicans to deny it. Not one has denied or does deny it. I stated that this bill would give the importers of the 4,500 tons which are stored in this country, and the producers here who have 1,500 tons stored, a direct gift of $3,700,000. That statement has been partially admitted by the amendment of my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

I charged that this bill taxes all users of tungsten steel $5,000,000 a year, that it takes out of the pockets of the people and puts into the pockets of a monopoly of four enriched corporations $5,000,000 annually. I challenged denial. Not one has denied or does deny it. The Republicans to-day have to a man voted for it.

Gentlemen, we all vividly recall the memorable contest which took place on this floor a few weeks ago, a contest which, it seemed, unfortunately became a party or partisan one. The President in a veto message complained that Congress had not provided sufficient funds for the rehabilitation work for our disabled soldiers, and asked Congress for a larger appropriation than had been granted for this purpose. In quick response to the President's appeal and the needs of our crippled soldier boys, the Democrats proposed an appropriation of $12,000,000, the amount needed. The Republicans at once, almost to a man—every leader among them—protested against this amount as extravagant, and "in the interest of economy" proposed an appropriation of only $8,000,000. They preferred to make an "economy record" than to properly care for the needs of our helpless, disabled soldiers. Mr. FORDNEY, Mr. GREEN, Mr. MONDELL, the majority leader; Mr. MADDEN, Dr. FESS, chairman of the Republican congressional committee, and other Republicans, who to-day are moving heaven and earth to tax the people $5,000,000 a year for the benefit not of the Government but a commercial monopoly, together with practically every Republican in the House, protested against, fought against, and voted against giving the additional $4,000,000 to the poor, wounded, disabled, and crippled soldier boys to help them make their lives worth the living. [Applause.] That protest, that fight, that vote in the interest of "Republican economy!"

I am glad and proud to recall that while the Republicans lined up almost to a man against that appropriation for the disabled boys from the trenches the Democrats to a man voted for it.

Oh, yes; the Republican leaders and ringsters of the House, who are now swinging and popping the party lash in this Chamber, whipping into line every Republican Member for the pending bill, could not then "in the interest of economy" appropriate $4,000,000 to help our maimed and crippled hero boys—the boys who, while in the trenches struggling to maintain the rights and honor of our country, had their legs shot off, had their arms shot off, had their eyes shot out! [Applause on Democratic side.]

But to-day when the special interests demand that these same Republicans tax the people—take out of the pockets of the people $5,000,000 a year and put it into the pockets of this enriched monopoly—of four corporations, as this bill does—not a Republican voice is raised against it, but every Republican in the House, amid applause and cheers, is voting for that monstrous proposition. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina has laid great stress upon the action of a number of Republicans in not supporting what he says was the recommendation of the President for $4,000,000 additional for the vocational training of the young men coming back from the war. The fact is the Republicans supported the President in giving the full amount of $8,000,000 recommended by him. No Republican opposed that appropriation because he was opposed to the system or because he wished in any degree to cripple that splendid undertaking. But the friends of that measure had said that we had already given them more money than they could use in the coming year, and knowing full well that Congress, being in session all the time, could supply any amount they wanted, they did not feel the necessity of voting more money than was necessary at that time. I wish to say to gentlemen that it is the purpose of the majority upon this side to provide some way whereby these boys who are coming back from the other side and taking their places in civil life again shall be protected in their honest endeavors against the cheap labor of Europe. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not yield. I have only five minutes. I wish to say that the same argument has been brought forward here to-day against this tungsten industry that was brought forward a few years ago when some enterprising and patriotic gentlemen sought to manufacture tin in the United States. It was said that it could not be manufactured, that it could not be found, that it would not benefit a thousand people in all the United States. That is what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] has said with reference to this tungsten industry. Yet the Republican Party under the leadership of that great protectionist and patriot, William McKinley [applause], put a tariff upon tin. And what was the result? We found we had plenty of it here within our own borders, and to-day we are manufacturing it more cheaply than any other country on the face of the earth, and to-day we are the greatest manufacturers of tin in all the world. [Applause.] That was due, if you please, to the protective-tariff policy of the Republican Party.

And I wish to call the attention of some of you southern gentlemen to the situation existing in your own country, where protection is needed for development more than in any other section of the United States. Before we got into this war a number of gentlemen, Members of this House, while in the State of Texas discovered that in all that country where previously there had been a great many sugar mills running only a few years ago, when the protective tariff was upon the sugar industry sufficient to warrant the manufacture of sugar, and where rice hullers were seen upon every side, every one of those sugar refineries was idle except one, every one of those rice hullers was idle. Why was it? You had only to ask the men who had raised cane and rice, and they would tell you that it was due to the damning influence of the Underwood bill, which had destroyed those industries.

In all of the country round about the one factory that was running at Sugar Land, in the State of Texas, they did not raise cane sufficient to satisfy one mill and they were importing it from Cuba.

I did not believe that I would ever see the day when the leaders of the Democratic Party would confess that there was any virtue in the Payne law. Yet we see them here to-day confessing that was a most virtuous measure; all of them denouncing it then, their leaders praising it now; and we have also lived to see the day when the President of the United States, who but a few years ago, when a private citizen, said that the protective policy of the Republican Party was a crime, advocates it—fresh, if you please, from the influences surrounding him when abroad, seeing how detrimental it is to place American labor in competition, if you please, with the cheaper labor of Europe. We have lived to see the day when the Vice President of the United States, who has also denounced the protective policy of the Republican Party on every rostrum in Indiana, admits it is a virtue and confesses that he has been wrong all these years.

The Democratic Party on this proposition is like a man riding on the train with his back to the engine. He never sees an object until he gets past it. Now the leader on the Democratic side is confessing that protection is a good thing by asserting his willingness to afford here as much protection to tungsten as was provided for it in the Payne bill, but, still blinded by the Democratic prejudice against the protective principle, is not willing to go far enough to meet the changed conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate close on the amendment and the bill in one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments close in one minute.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the motion by making it 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the motion made by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend it by making it 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment that debate close in 10 minutes.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that debate close in one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] is a member of the committee and has not spoken on this subject. I ask unanimous consent that he have five minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. How much more time is there of this debate?

Mr. FORDNEY. That will make six minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman then ask for any more? It is pretty hard for some of us to sit here all day and listen to this. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I amend my motion and ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and the bill close in six minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and the bill close in six minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. KEARNS. I object.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then I move that all debate close in six minutes.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. Did not the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that debate close in one minute prevail?

The CHAIRMAN. It did.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY], who is a member of the committee and who has not spoken to-day, be given five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] be allowed to speak for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. One minute remains of debate upon this paragraph and the bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the record of this debate upon this measure would be complete without having in it the views of a Cabinet member of the present administration with reference to protective measures on this particular mineral. When in the spring of 1918 we had up under consideration the bill to appropriate $50,000,000 to take care of the producers of tungsten and like minerals, and the hearings were being had, the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, made the following statement to the Committee on Mines and Mining with reference to these minerals and the need to protect the producers:

> What will be the use of the money that we have or the minerals that we have? * * *
> We know approximately what we have. We simply want to be able to say to the small man and to the large man, "Gentlemen, go farther in and find out what you have. Bring it out, and we will see that you are not ruined by competition of foreign countries. I think that is good Americanism; I think that is common sense."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. CRISP to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 111, noes 135.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion that the committee do now rise and report the bill, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4437 and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Mr. KITCHIN moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report the same back instanter with the following amendments:
>
> Strike out all of the bill after the word "namely" in line 7, page 1, and insert the following: > a. Tungsten ores of all kinds, 10 per cent ad valorem.
> b. Tungsten, tungsten powder, ferrotungsten (lump and pulverized) and ferrotungsten powder, 20 per cent ad valorem.
> SEC. 3. That the provisions of any act inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, on the motion to recommit I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to recommit.

The question was taken.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 138, nays 170, answered "present" 1, not voting 121, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. WASON (for) with Mr. BOOHER (against).

Mr. CANNON (for) with Mr. WHALEY (against).

Mr. HADLEY (for) with Mr. HAMILL (against).

Mr. ROWE (for) with Mr. MOORE of Virginia (against).

Mr. MANN (for) with Mr. BLACKMON (against).

Mr. MCKINLEY with Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that I can qualify——

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall and listening when his name was called?

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. I was not. If I were permitted to vote, however, I would ask to be recorded as "yea." Can I be recorded as "present"?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not be so recorded.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. TIMBERLAKE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE—METEOROLOGICAL CONFERENCE AT PARIS (H. DOC. NO. 197).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and ordered printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

In view of the provision contained in the deficiency act approved March 4, 1913, that "hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitation to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event, without first having specific authority of law to do so," I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress and for its determination whether it will authorize the acceptance of the invitation and the appropriation necessary to defray the expenses incident thereto, a report from the Secretary of State with accompanying papers, being an invitation from the Government of the French Republic to that of the United States to send delegates to a proposed conference to be held at Paris on September 30, 1919, to consider questions relating to the reorganization of the service of the exchange of meteorological information, and for other purposes, and a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture showing the favor with which he views the proposed gathering, and recommending an appropriation of $1,500 to defray the expenses of participation by at least two delegates.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
21 August, 1919.

CONTESTED ELECTION CASE OF TAGUE AGAINST FITZGERALD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in receipt of a communication from the Clerk of the House, transmitting papers in the election case of Tague against Fitzgerald. The letter, with the papers in the case, is ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Elections No. 2.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STEVENSON, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for 10 days, on account of campaign for good-road bonds and cotton organization.

GENERAL TO THE ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present a minority report from the Committee on Military Affairs on the bill (H. R. 7595) relating to the creation of the office of general to the armies of the United States and authorizing the President to nominate to said office a general officer of the Army who within the United States and during the recent war has rendered especially distinguished service.

Mr. GARNER. What bill is that?

Mr. SANFORD. A bill to confer the grade of general on some general officer in the service within the United States.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request is granted.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, August 22, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting schedules and lists of papers, documents, etc., on the files of the Treasury Department which are not needed in the transaction of public business and which have no permanent value or historical interest, submitted in conformity with the provisions of the act approved February 16, 1889, as amended (H. Doc. No. 194); to the committee on the Disposition of Useless Executive Papers and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting request that authority be granted to the Director of Air Service to publish and circulate at Government expense a bulletin to be issued quarterly entitled "A Bulletin of the Air Medical Service" (H. Doc. No. 195); to the Committee on Printing and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the acting chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting report on the leather and shoe industries in part covering the period from 1914 to 1917, inclusive, and in part covering the period from 1914 to 1918 (H. Doc. No. 196); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GRIGSBY, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7709) to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $75,000, for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric-light and power plant, and for the construction of a public-school building, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 245), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7632) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to ratify, approve, and confirm sections 1, 2, and 3 of an act duly enacted by the legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relating to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory, as herein amended, and amending the laws relating thereto," approved March 28, 1916, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 246), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HAUGEN, from the Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 247), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8361) granting a pension to Samuel C. Braden; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 7862) granting a pension to Harry Wetmore Miller; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 6119) granting an increase of pension to Reuben S. Parker; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 22, 1919.

Rev. John Paul Tyler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, judge of all the earth, God of our Fathers, command, we beseech Thee, upon us Thy servants this day Thy spirit of grace and wisdom, that in all that shall be done and said Thy name may be glorified. Hasten the day, we beseech Thee, when out of all the tumult and the shouting and the noise among the nations of the world the still, small voice of Thy love and wisdom shall be heard. Bless, we beseech Thee, our country, our President, the nations of the world, and grant that the day may soon come when the government of the world shall rest upon the shoulders of Him who is our Lord and King. Bless those who are sick and in distress of any kind. Bless every home in our land. Keep us true and faithful to Thee until the end, and then grant to us Thine own blessed well-done. For we ask it in Jesus' name. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

EXTERMINATION OF COTTON-BOLL WEEVIL.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, in view of the high cost of living which is being emphasized so much now, and the imperative necessity of working and saving, I wish to present a very brief report this morning on the cotton-boll weevil. I do not ask to read it, but will print it in the RECORD with a short explanation.

We all know that the cotton-boll weevil has done immense damage and probably reduced the production of cotton so greatly that the product is now bringing a much higher price than it would bring if there were a large supply of it on hand.

It is thought by those who have investigated the subject carefully, and I am one of them, that a remedy for the boll-weevil pest in cotton has been discovered through a poison known as calcium arsenate, which was developed in Tallulah, La., at an experiment station there conducted for the Department of Agriculture by Mr. B. R. Coad, an able scientist, under the auspices of the Bureau of Entomology. Mr. Coad has been working at this very thoroughly and scientifically, and I may add successfully, for the past 8 or 10 years.

Some of the largest planters in the Mississippi Delta have tried it extensively. One of these gentlemen is Prof. J. W. Fox, of Scott, Miss., who is general manager of the largest cotton plantation in the world. There are 16,000 acres of cotton in cultivation on this big plantation under the management of Mr. Fox. He says in a letter addressed to me under date of August 15:

I am now ready to say unqualifiedly that this poison will control the weevil at a cost which is not prohibitive.

Another very large planter of Mississippi is Mr. Alex Y. Scott, who is the manager of several successful plantations at Rosedale. He indorses the poison in unqualified language in a letter of August 6 addressed to Mr. Coad, which I will print as a part of my remarks.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will be glad to yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. I will state that I am personally acquainted with Mr. Scott and Mr. Fox, both most estimable gentlemen, managers of very large plantations. I talked to Mr. Scott on the same proposition. They wrote me also that they were carried away with the system of eradicating the weevil and that the success of the experiments which they made was very great.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator from Mississippi for his contribution. I was about to say that one of the largest cotton planters in Louisiana is Mr. George S. Yerger, of Mound, in Madison Parish. I will read a short paragraph from his letter addressed to Mr. Coad, under date of August 6:

I have been applying it—

That is, the calcium-arsenate poison—

according to your advice, and am delighted to report that in a number of fields where the infestation was as high as 47 per cent—

He means the infestation of the cotton-boll weevil—

I have been able to reduce it to around 3 per cent, and if weather conditions are at all favorable from now on I should make quite a bale per acre on the fields above referred to, which would have produced hardly anything had I not applied this arsenate; in fact, I know of a number of crops in this section that will not make a bale to 20 acres and had no more weevil than I had when I began poisoning.

There is a letter each from Mr. Alex Clarke, of Mound, La., and Mr. D. D. Ewing, of Mound, La., addressed to Mr. Coad on the same subject, which I shall print.

Then I have a letter from Mr. A. W. Barrett, of Albany, Ga., to which I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. It is addressed to the drug firm in Vicksburg, Miss., which has been handling this poison under the auspices of Mr. Coad. This letter of Mr. Barrett seems to indorse the poison very strongly and calls the attention of the Georgia people to it.

Mr. Coad gives the results of experiments made by a gentleman in Louisiana, and I will make just a very brief reference to it. This gentleman is Mr. F. J. Venerable, of Jeanerette, La. He made a test last year on a small field of 5 acres of cotton, two fields rather of 2½ acres each in separate plats. One half of each plat was poisoned and the other half not poisoned. I will not attempt to give the details but just the results. Mr. Coad says in this report:

Average by yield per acre for the two varieties of cotton tested by Mr. Venerable was 159 pounds of lint cotton per acre in his untreated cotton—and 463 pounds of lint cotton per acre in his poisoned cotton.

That is, the cotton not poisoned—

Thus showing a gain of 304 pounds of lint cotton per acre or a gain of 253 per cent on the poisoned cotton over the unpoisoned.

Anyone who is a cotton grower knows that that is a marvelous gain, that a yield of 463 pounds of lint cotton is a very satisfactory yield, and that 159 pounds is certainly not profitable.

Mr. President, without taking more of the time of the Senate I ask leave to publish along with my remarks this report of Mr. Coad addressed to Dr. L. O. Howard, Chief of the Bureau of Entomology, and the letters to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROSEDALE, MISS., August 6, 1919.

Mr. B. R. COAD,
Tallulah, La.

DEAR SIR: Having in mind our conversation with Senator RANSDELL, and his request for information in regard to poisoning boll weevils, I am writing you this letter thinking that you may forward it to him, with other data requested by the Senator.

The detailed operation of the poison, the amount of poison to be used, when and how it should be applied, and exact results, by check plats, you can give to the Senator.

I was first assured of the success of your poison on a trip to a plantation near Tallulah, where I saw 20 rows of cotton well fruited, white, and yielding a reasonable crop, and the cotton on each side of the 20 rows showing less than a bale to 10 acres. I estimated the 20 rows around a third of a bale to the acre, and I believe that it turned out a little in excess of that. This 20 rows was in an extremely poor state of cultivation, and practically all of the fruit was made at the top and on the ends of the limbs, showing that the fruit had been put on late in the year. I was informed that this 20 rows had been barred off in July, and the plant indicated that such was the case.

I saw several other things on that occasion that convinced me of the efficacy of the poison.

The following season I attempted early in the season to get you to secure some poison and machines for me, but this you declined to do. However, along the latter part of July the weevil destruction was so great on my Panther Forest plantation, in Arkansas, that I felt it afforded an opportunity for a reasonably large experiment in boll-weevil poisoning, not to make cotton but to save the bolls already set on the plant. With this in view, you secured for me poison, and it was sent by express from New York City. Some 300 acres of the worst infested cotton was poisoned, with a result of not only saving the cotton poisoned but preventing the spread of the weevil to other parts of the plantation, and it was estimated that by this process some 50 bales of cotton was added to the crop.

After this, the following summer, I purchased nine power machines and several thousand pounds of the poison, making an investment of some $20,000. Last year there was only a small amount of the poison used because of weather conditions and the little boll-weevil damage. This year, however, I am using the poison freely, and thus far with excellent results. There is not a doubt in my opinion but that you have discovered a means of controlling the weevil. Of course, details are yet to be worked out, dusting machines yet to be perfected, and machines for the small farmer as well as the large farmer to be developed.

The poison is way beyond the experiment of doubtful state, and is certain to give results.

I sincerely hope that Senator RANSDELL and Mr. WILSON will be able to secure for you the funds necessary to complete your work. I feel that the benefit which it will prove to the South and the whole country is inestimable.

Yours, very truly,

ALEX Y. SCOTT.

MOUND, LA., August 1, 1919.

Mr. B. R. COAD,
Tallulah, La.

DEAR SIR: I have just received your letter asking my candid opinion as to the merits or demerits, as per my observation, of the calcium-arsenate preparation that you are now using in this section in your campaign against the boll weevil.

I have been working with the boll weevil now about nine years and have always tried to carry out all the Government instructions. I have picked up squares, burned stalks, cleaned up around the edges of new ground, and done everything to try to keep them down, but I have never found anything that gave the results as this calcium arsenate. I have been trying it now, off and on, for about four years. The first time I tried it was on July 25 four years ago. I had a piece of cotton, 3 acres, and awfully in grass. I worked it out, got it clean and in good shape, poisoned half of it five or six times during the latter part of July and August—to the other half I didn't do anything, only kept it worked at the same time and in the same way as I did the other—and made close to half a bale of cotton to the acre on that I poisoned. I never got a bale on that I did not poison.

I am this year spending about $800 or $1,000 on a little place I have, and I surely would not do so unless I had the utmost confidence in it.

I have about 120 acres in cotton; some of it two weeks ago was about 60 per cent infested. I poisoned it twice and have it down now to about 15 per cent. I expect to poison it twice more and am expecting to make a good bale of cotton to the acre on pretty near my whole place.

Yours, truly,

ALEX CLARKE.

Mr. B. R. COAD,
Tallulah, La.

DEAR SIR: Referring to yours of recent date asking that you be advised what conclusions I have drawn as to the value of the powdered calcium arsenate and the other preparations that your laboratory has been using in extensive field trials on a large scale through this section for the past three or four years.

The fact that your laboratory has hit upon what might be called a specific for the boll weevil was conclusively demonstrated, to my mind, in 1915, as a result of the work done in that year on Algodon plantation, where a strip of cotton that had been abandoned to coco was barred off on July 25 of that year, all the fruit on the cotton up to that time having been destroyed by the boll weevil, and afterwards treated. When I saw this strip of cotton again in December it had not been picked, and I estimated that on stalks about knee high, or a little better, you had nearly one-fourth of a bale to the acre on the treated strip and practically nothing on the balance of the field.

I have seen and known in considerable detail of the work in Arkansas, the work on the Mississippi Delta Planting Co.'s properties, the Scott properties near Rosedale, and some of the work in Madison Parish each year since that time, and I feel sure that with proper machinery for the distribution of the poison, such as you are now using, it is entirely practicable to raise cotton in boll-weevil territory without regard to the degree of infestation, provided that the work of poisoning is handled by men competent to determine where, when, and in what quantity the poison should be applied.

There is, of course, much to be learned in connection with this work, which is still, to a considerable degree, in the experimental stage, and much care will have to be taken to see that the arsenical preparations used are properly compounded to avoid burning the plants; but if these matters are properly handled there can be no question in the mind of any unprejudiced observer but that the boll-weevil problem has been solved by the Delta laboratory since your assignment to the Tallulah station.

If any other information that I may have might be of service to you in any way it is entirely at your disposal at any time.

Yours, very truly,

D. D. EWING.

Senator JOSEPH E. RANSDELL,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR RANSDELL: On May 27 I wrote you in reply to your inquiry in regard to our experience with calcium arsenate for boll-weevil control. Since writing you at that time we have had almost another full season's experience. We have used about 50 tons of this poison, and I am now ready to say unqualifiedly that this poison will control the weevil at a cost which is not prohibitive.

I feel that this method of weevil control is so enormously important to the entire cotton belt that the Bureau of Entomology, under which this method has been worked out, should have every facility extended it in the way of funds to carry on this work in order that every cotton planter in the South may have advantage of it.

As you are aware, there has been a lot of poison put on the market which has not been properly made, and if applied would have seriously damaged cotton. Up to this time Mr. Coad informs me that they have been fortunate enough to catch this poison and examine it at their laboratory at Tallulah, La., before any damage has been done. This will have to be continually watched, and, of course, an immense amount of educational propaganda will have to be done if the cotton planters of the South are to get the full benefit of this method.

I feel like you are in position to do more to help this particular work than anyone else, as you are using the poison and know from first-hand knowledge that it will control.

Yours, very truly,

J. W. FOX,
General Manager.

Mr. B. R. COAD,
Bureau of Entomology, Tallulah, La.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 28th ultimo, requesting my opinion of the use of calcium arsenate for the control of boll weevil, is before me.

The fact that I have, this season, purchased a carload of this material from Riches, Piver & Co., New York, for my own use is, I think, conclusive proof of my faith in it.

I have been applying it according to your advice and am delighted to report that in a number of fields where the infestation was as high as 47 per cent I have been able to reduce it to around 3 per cent, and if weather conditions are at all favorable from now on I should make quite a bale per acre on the fields above referred to, which would not have produced hardly anything had I not applied this arsenate; in fact, I know of a number of crops in this section that will not make a bale to 20 acres and had no more weevil than I had when I began poisoning.

The cotton producers of the South certainly owe a debt to you and the Bureau of Entomology that can never be repaid.

Wishing for you and the department continued success, I am,

Yours, very truly,

GEO. S. YERGER.

GENTLEMEN: I inclose herewith check to cover invoice of calcium arsenate. I also inclose a clipping from the Albany Herald, which shows what I think of this plan of exterminating the boll weevil. I also inclose freight bill covering this shipment of calcium and have deducted same from this invoice, as per your instructions.

Yours, very truly, A. W. BARRETT.

[Extract from Albany Herald, Albany, Ga.]

"BARRETT PLEASED WITH BOLL-WEEVIL POISONING PLAN—BIG FARMER TRIES GOVERNMENT PREPARATION SUCCESSFULLY—BOTH EFFECTIVE AND INEXPENSIVE, HE SAYS.

"The Government preparation for spraying boll weevils is a success, according to the experiments made by Mr. A. W. Barrett, one of the largest farmers in this section.

"Mr. Barrett has sprayed 45 acres with the calcium-arsenate preparation, which the Department of Agriculture recommends, and is well pleased with the results, he told a representative of the Herald yesterday afternoon. Mr. Barrett has sprayed some of the cotton four times, another portion of it three times, and some only twice, doing the spraying in the early morning, when the dew is still on the cotton. The idea worked on in this method is that the dew becomes saturated with the poison, and when the boll weevil drinks the dew he becomes poisoned.

NO WEEVILS ON SPRAYED COTTON.

"Mr. Barrett stated that he has gone over the sprayed cotton very carefully and has been able to find only one boll weevil, while other tracts of cotton on the Byne plantation, where the spraying was not done, are literally eaten up with weevils, some untreated stalks having as many as four or five weevils to the bloom. The cotton that has been sprayed will make a half bale to the acre, Mr. Barrett thinks.

"Another pleasing feature of the experiment to Mr. Barrett is the comparatively low cost of the applications. He finds that an acre can be sprayed four times for $5. This, he says, is cheaper than having the squares picked up twice a week and produces more cotton per acre.

WILL SPRAY ALL NEXT YEAR.

"So well pleased is this farmer with his experience in poisoning boll weevils that he announces his intention of spraying all the cotton on his big plantation next year with this preparation.

"Numerous other tests of this preparation are being made in Dougherty County, and so far not an unfavorable report has been made. County Agent Cromartie is conducting experiments in different parts of the county, and he will make a complete report on the experiment in the next few days."

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, BUREAU OF ENTOMOLOGY,
SOUTHERN FIELD CROP INSECT INVESTIGATIONS,
Tallulah, La., August 1, 1919.

Memorandum for Dr. Howard relative to request for information on the subject of weevil poisoning experiments.

I assume from the tone of the request received from Senator RANSDELL and Representative WILSON that they are desirous of securing more recent information on the results of our weevil poisoning work than that contained in our bulletins and circulars. Consequently, while I wish to sketch something of the progress of this investigation from its very beginning, I will deal only very briefly with the results of the early plat tests, as these are practically all contained in my bulletin, No. 731, a copy of which is inclosed herewith for reference in case more detailed information should be desired.

The first indication of possible success in poisoning the boll weevil developed during the course of biological investigations conducted in 1913 and 1914, but it was not until 1915 that I had an opportunity to test this in the field even on a very small scale. Briefly, the biological investigations mentioned demonstrated the extreme importance of water to the continued existence of the boll weevil, and it was quite obvious that they very frequently drank water from any source from which they could obtain it. Apparently the most important source under field conditions was the dew or rain droplets collected on the leaves of the plants. Owing to repeated failures in securing any considerable degree of control from poisons aimed at ingestion with the food the writer decided to attempt to devise a form of poison which could be ingested by the weevil during this drinking process. Consequently a number of types of poisons were tested, and finally in 1915 a number of field experiments were inaugurated. For the purpose of these experiments of 1915 triplicate series of plats were surveyed on three different plantations near Tallulah. Each of these series consisted of five plats of about 1 acre each, as nearly uniform as possible in all conditions affecting their production of cotton. In each case the two end plats were given four, five, and six applications of poison, respectively. It was soon evident that this poisoning was exerting a very decided control on the weevils, as the weevil infestation was considerably reduced in the poisoned plats, and these plats continued blooming much later in the season than did the adjoining unpoisoned ones. When the cotton was picked from these plats rather surprising results were secured. Every poisoned plat yielded more than the untreated checks, but the most pronounced feature was the much greater increase in yield with the larger number of poisonings. With four applications a gain of about 15 per cent was secured; with five applications this gain was increased to about 35 per cent; while with six applications it was increased about 70 per cent. In other words, a single extra application over four more than doubled the gain, while two extra applications over four increased the gain between four and five fold. As all applications were started at the same time and the extra treatments consisted simply of a continuation that much later in the season this seemed to point out very significantly the importance of late-season applications.

The results of these experiments were certainly definite and significant, but it was considered possible that they might have been due to some peculiar conditions prevailing during that season and that they could not be duplicated during another year. Consequently the experiments during the season of 1916 were planned largely to check the results secured during 1915, with the important change that provision was made for a wider range in the periods of application. In 1916 the applications in the different experiments extended from the first appearance of the weevils in June until about the 1st of September. On the whole the results in 1916 were just as definite as were those of 1915, and the greater importance of the late-season applications were very plainly demonstrated. In this connection a detailed description of a few of the tests is of interest.

Probably the most spectacular test of the season, and the one which aroused the most interest, was conducted in a cut of abandoned cotton. Poor drainage and excessive rains during May and June had prevented cultivation of this cut, and on the 25th of July there were no prospects whatever of a crop. The plants were only about 10 inches high, and had been so heavily infested by the weevils that there had been no blooms since June. Thus an opportunity was afforded to determine what could be accomplished by poisoning under the most extreme conditions imaginable. An attempt was made to work the cotton out about the 1st of August, and a small plat in the center of the cut—only six-tenths of an acre in size—was poisoned. This poisoning was continued during the month of August, and surprising results were secured. The weevil infestation decreased rapidly in the poisoned plat, and the plants soon started blooming and continued to bloom practically until frost, in spite of the fact that all surrounding cotton was very heavily infested with weevils, and undoubtedly hundreds, if not thousands, were moving into the poisoned cotton daily. When the cotton matured a remarkable sight was presented. The unpoisoned cotton showed practically no open bolls, while the poisoned plat to the very last row was practically white with open cotton. When the cotton was picked it was found that the unpoisoned plats yielded 45 and 65 pounds of seed cotton per acre, respectively, while the poisoned plat yielded about 500 pounds per acre. This, of course, did not constitute a good yield of cotton, but was very remarkable in view of the opportunity which this cotton had had to produce a crop. This test was particularly interesting because of the severe conditions, which prevented the unpoisoned cotton from making any production, because the plants were so small and because it was possible to poison the last row of the treated plat effectively without allowing the poison to drift onto the adjoining check-row. For this reason the line of demarcation between the plats was much more pronounced than usually was possible.

Additional tests during the same season located in better cotton frequently gave larger gains in production per acre, but, of course, the percentage of gain was not so large. In one case of poisoning during the month of July a gain of about 600 pounds of seed cotton per acre was secured. Probably the most interesting feature of this test was the fact that there were 22 days of rain during the month when the applications were made. This seemed to indicate that successful results could be secured from poisoning in spite of excessively rainy weather, and tended to allay the fear that dry weather would be essential to successful results.

In another case a portion of a cut of new ground practically surrounded by heavy timber was poisoned. This was very heavily infested with weevils, but the poisoned plat yielded about 1,700 pounds of seed cotton per acre as compared with about 900 for the check. The treatments in this case were practically confined to late July.

In all, about 15 experiments were conducted during 1916, and the results showed definitely that it was possible to poison the weevils profitably under certain conditions. Again the increased value of late-season applications was obvious, for, as a general rule, the early-season applications gave only slight gains with a very doubtful profit, whereas the late-season applications all showed pronounced profits.

At the beginning of the season of 1917 it was recognized that the experiments to date had merely demonstrated the possibility of poisoning weevils successfully, and that all phases of the economic use of the poison remained still to be worked out. Consequently a very elaborate series of experiments was inaugurated in that season, and about 75 tests were started in the neighborhood of Tallulah, La., each one intended to determine some particular point of importance. These consisted of studies of the comparative efficacy of different poisons, the time of day of application giving the best results, the most profitable season of application, the proper interval between applications, the requisite amount of poison per acre, and many other similar questions, all of which would have to be answered before definite general advice as to the use of the poison could be given. The early studies had shown that under certain conditions poisoning was profitable, but it was apparent that any change in these conditions might easily result in a much lower gain, if not in an actual loss, and it was essential to determine thoroughly the possibilities and limitations of boll-weevil poisoning before releasing any information for public use. Unfortunately for the experimental work the season of 1917, in the vicinity of Tallulah, was most remarkable for the light degree of weevil damage. This was due to a peculiar combination of seasonal conditions and resulted in an almost complete absence of weevil damage in all of the cotton in which tests had been planned. In other words, the yield of cotton in these cuts was just the same as if no weevils had been present. Of course, weevil-control experiments could not be conducted under such conditions, and the majority of the Tallulah experiments had to be given up for the season. Nevertheless, a dozen or more cuts were located immediately adjoining timber, where a somewhat heavier degree of infestation was experienced, and in these cases the rule prevailed that the heavier the infestation the greater the gain due to poisoning.

In addition to the experiments just detailed, a number were conducted in the North Delta, in Chicot County, near Lake Village, Ark., and in Washington County, near Scott, Miss. At both of these points a heavier infestation was produced by different seasonal conditions, and pronounced results were secured from the poison. In every case the experiments were conducted on comparatively small areas, subject to a continual influx of weevils from surrounding untreated cotton, but in spite of this a very definite weevil control resulted from poisoning. The open cotton in every case showed a definite gain to the last row of treatment. The gains per acre ranged from 250 pounds to 1,007 pounds of seed cotton.

It is, of course, impossible to estimate how much larger these gains would have been if entire cuts or entire plantations had been treated and thus the inflow of weevils from unpoisoned cotton prevented; but it is clear that these gains secured on small plats were very conservative. In fact, this was brought out well by one large-scale treatment described below.

About the middle of August the writer was requested to attempt the control of the weevil on a large section of an Arkansas plantation. This cotton was on very fair land but had not been planted until well along in May. Weather conditions then retarded it greatly, and it did not start setting a crop until about the latter part of July. About the middle of August a fair crop of bolls was present, but the plants were large and leafy and the weevils had multiplied so rapidly that one of the heaviest infestations ever witnessed by the writer prevailed. Blooming had practically ceased, and the weevils had cleaned up the squares so thoroughly that they were attacking the bolls in enormous numbers, and all bolls, even to the largest present, were being riddled with punctures. It seemed probable that on one section no bolls would be left to open. It was, of course, too late to attempt to set a new crop by poisoning, but an effort was made to save the bolls then present on the plants. For this purpose large-scale treatments were continued from August 23 to about September 1, several hundred acres in all being treated. At the beginning of the work a series of counts showed that 86 per cent of the squares in the cotton which was to be poisoned had been weevil punctured. This cotton was given a single poisoning, and about 10 days later it was found that the weevil infestation in those same cuts had been reduced so that only 36 per cent of the squares were punctured. During the same period the infestation in the adjoining unpoisoned cotton had been increasing steadily. Practically all of the poisoned cuts started blooming again at this time, and a number of them reached what is ordinarily termed the "flower-garden" stage of blooming, five to seven blooms per plant on a single day being not at all rare. In starting this treatment it had been anticipated that several applications would be necessary to produce the desired result, but the effect of the single application was so pronounced that it seemed unnecessary to repeat it. The weevils had been so reduced that only 36 per cent of the squares were punctured, and although thousands of weevils were being bred out from the squares on the ground or were coming in from other plantations every day, it was still obvious that the weevils would greatly reduce their attack on the bolls until they had caught up with the squares then present, and that this period would be long enough to allow the bolls to become sufficiently hardened to avoid weevil damage.

At the conclusion of these experiments during 1917 it seemed quite obvious that it was possible to poison the weevil profitably, at least under certain conditions, and, furthermore, it seemed worth while to test this method of control on a considerably larger scale. A number of planters in the Mississippi Delta had been following our work rather closely, and desired to try poisoning their entire crops. Consequently arrangements were made with two concerns, the Mississippi Delta Planting Co., of Scott, Miss., and the Charles Scott's Mississippi Delta plantations, of Rosedale, Miss., for treating their entire properties. The planters furnished poison, machinery, labor, and, in fact, covered all expenses of the operation except that of supervision. We provided the supervision and also detailed a number of men to the task of keeping up with the progress of the weevil infestation, and thus giving us an idea of the results secured. The property of the Mississippi Delta Planting Co., at Scott, Miss., consisted of 17 plantations in one block, and contained a total of about 16,000 acres of cotton. The property of the Charles Scott's Mississippi Delta plantations, of Rosedale, Miss., consisted of seven plantations, six of which were located in Bolivar County, Miss., and one in Chicot County, Ark., near Luna Landing. In all, these contained about 6,000 acres of cotton.

A little later in the season similar arrangements for poisoning were made at several other points, the principal one of these being the Maxwell-Yerger Co., with headquarters at Mound, La., and Argyle plantation of Putnam & Norman Co., located at Fordoche, La. In all, during the course of the season of 1918, between thirty and thirty-five thousand acres of cotton were included in our experimental work. Throughout practically all of this work careful records were kept of the weevil abundance by cuts throughout all of this area, and the poison applications were based entirely upon the apparent need of each particular cut. In this way a vast amount of very important and valuable information was secured; far too much, in fact, to even attempt to summarize for the present memorandum. Generally speaking, however, the results were quite satisfactory, even more so than had been anticipated in fact, and in every case where weevil poisoning was started at the outset of the season we were able to completely eliminate weevil injury from the treated plantations, in spite of the fact that in many cases a fairly high infestation prevailed at the outset. Probably the best proof of the results secured is the fact that in every case the planters concerned were so pleased that they invested still larger amounts in the spring of 1919 to provide for the treatment of their entire crop this year.

In conjunction with this practical control work a great number of more or less technical experiments were continued in order to aid in securing information to serve as a basis for developing the most efficient technique of weevil treatment.

During the midsummer of 1918 a progress report of our work was published, and attracted so much attention that thereafter our investigations were observed very closely by a great many planters, and the results were sufficiently striking that at the outset of the present season it was quite obvious that a considerable amount of commercial poisoning would be done this year. A practically new insecticide had been developed for this work, and up to the fall of 1918 only one company was manufacturing it commercially. However, the prospects for this year were so obvious that at least a dozen companies began producing this product and have been selling it all this season. We have not a complete report of the amount actually sold for use in boll-weevil control this year, but from the data on hand it is quite obvious that over 1,000,000 pounds have been sold so far, and it is quite apparent that practically all of this material in sight in the country will be disposed of very shortly. In fact, the limiting factor this year has been the supply of dusting machinery available for use. When we began our poisoning work we found that there was not a single machine on the market suitable for use on cotton. Consequently it has been necessary for us to devise special machinery throughout this investigation. Owing to rather limited facilities, we have had considerable difficulty in this work, but on the whole fairly satisfactory progress has been made, and several factories arranged to provide this special machinery during the season of 1919. However, their producing capacity was somewhat limited, and proved totally unequal to meet the demand. In all, probably four to five hundred large power machines, selling at from $400 to $600 each, were made, and these are all sold. In addition, apparently some six to eight thousand hand guns have been sold for this work. It is, of course, entirely too early yet to prophesy anything of the results secured in 1919, but, owing to the extreme lateness of the cotton crop and the rather unusually heavy weevil infestation prevailing in most parts of the cotton belt, this poisoning has been going on for some time, and so far very satisfactory results are being secured in every place where we have any record, and this probably includes something over 75,000 acres of cotton. The present status of the investigations is briefly as follows:

There is no longer any question that the boll weevil can be controlled very profitably by the use of calcium arsenate under certain conditions. However, it has proven to be a rather limited method of control and dependent on localized conditions. Owing to the complications involved, it has been impossible so far to develop this work to the point where definite rules for treatment can be promulgated. Furthermore, practically all of the experimental work up to the present year has been conducted under the peculiar type of conditions existing in the Mississippi delta, and it is quite obvious that while the same general methods may be followed elsewhere, it is going to take considerable study under different types of conditions before this method can be adapted to fit these varying conditions. Consequently at present the only advice we can give the farmers is more or less indefinite and conditional and leaves much to the discretion of the individual supervising the work. Owing to these facts we have generally advised the farmer to go rather slow in adopting this method of weevil control and to take it up only experimentally until we are able to carry the investigations to the point of issuing much more definite instructions. Unfortunately many farmers are not inclined to heed the conservative advice, and I am very much afraid there is going to be quite a number of failures this year, owing simply to the fact that they are attempting poisoning on a large scale under conditions where we have had no experimental work whatever and are unable to give them any definite advice. However, so far this season the reports reaching us have been very optimistic, and, generally speaking, the farmers seem quite satisfied with the early results secured.

As early as 1918 a few farmers undertook weevil poisoning on their own account, and while in the majority of cases it is very difficult to get definite records of the results secured, we have received these records from a few farmers. One of the most interesting of these is the case of Mr. F. J. Venerable, of Jeanerette, La. Mr. Venerable selected two cuts of cotton, each 2½ acres in size, and split them so that one half of each was treated with poison and the other half allowed to remain untreated as a check. Unfortunately Mr. Venerable was delayed somewhat by unavoidable circumstances in starting the treatment on this cotton, and it had reached a rather high degree of weevil infestation before the first application was made. Four applications were made, starting the middle of July, and repeated about every two weeks. Throughout this work Mr. Venerable kept separate records of percentage of squares punctured by weevils in poisoned and unpoisoned cotton, and the figures as forwarded to this office are shown in the following table:

Date.	Per cent infested.
	Check.	Poisoned.
July 15	43.9	41.7
July 22	54.7	18.8
Aug. 3	72.0	18.8
Aug. 10	83.0	30.8

From this it is seen that Mr. Venerable started poisoning with practically the same infestation in the two cuts, namely, a little over 40 per cent. Immediately after the first treatment, however, the infestation decreased considerably in the poisoned cotton and remained fairly low throughout the remainder of the season, while it continued to increase in the check plat. Mr. Venerable reported in detail on the results of this test some months ago, but a few days ago I wrote him for a summary of these results, and under date of August 2 he wrote as follows:

It is with pleasure that I furnish you with what data I have in hand relative to your 1918 boll-weevil poisoning experiment.

All data as to infestation count have been destroyed, as these records were kept on loose leaves.

But the final results are still at hand and are as follows: Two and a half acres planted to Cleveland big boll April 16, half of which was poisoned 4 times; one application we got little of any results on account of rain coming within 12 hours of application. Applications were made as near 14 days apart as weather would permit. The weights were:

Nonpoison area, 766 pounds of seed cotton.

Poison area, 1,997 pounds of seed cotton.

Two and one-half acres planted Express cotton, one-half poisoned and one-half not poisoned. Planted same day and received same care and cultivation as Cleveland big boll. Weights were:

Nonpoison area, 344 pounds of seed cotton.

Poison area, 1,320 pounds of seed cotton.

I wish to state that had I started poisoning 14 days earlier, when infestation was around 10 to 15 instead of 25 to 40, and continued 14 days later I would have most doubled the yield.

My opinion is, under normal season on our rich lands here, cotton planted on 6-foot rows will yield more than one bale per acre average, if poisoned.

Averaged by yield per acre for the two varieties of cotton tested Mr. Venerable reported 159 pounds of lint cotton per acre in his untreated cotton and 463 pounds of lint cotton per acre in his poisoned cotton, thus showing a gain of 304 pounds of lint cotton per acre, or a gain of 253 per cent over check.

Of all the men who have watched our results there are five who have undoubtedly had more experience than any others in this regard. They are Alex Scott, general manager of the Charles Scott's Mississippi Delta plantations; Prof. J. W. Fox, general manager of the Mississippi Delta Planting Co.; George S. Yerger, general manager of the Maxwell-Yerger Co.; Alex Clarke, a farmer located near Duckport, La., and Maj. D. D. Ewing, auditor and assistant manager of the Maxwell-Yerger Co. I have requested each of these gentlemen to write me his views and opinions of the work so far and am attaching these letters to the present memorandum in order that you may have an opportunity to note the opinions of disinterested planters who have had considerable experience with weevil poisoning.

Mr. W. C. Piver, of the Riches-Piver Co., Vicksburg, Miss., has just been in the office and handed me a letter and clipping received from Mr. A. W. Barrett, of Albany, Ga., which gives something of his results secured during the present season.

Another interesting case of results being secured this year is the report just made by Mr. L. C. Winterton, manager Sycamore Planting Co., of Ferriday, La. Mr. Winterton purchased a power machine and several tons of calcium arsenate and has been poisoning about three or four hundred acres of cotton for the past several weeks. This work has been entirely under Mr. Winterton's supervision, and the only instructions received from this office were those contained in our circular matter. Consequently we are especially pleased to have his report, as it represents the results of absolutely independent work. In outlining his poisoning Mr. Winterton arranged for two different check tests. In one case he divided a field so that the central portion remained unpoisoned, while the two ends were given regular treatments. Mr. Winterton made infestation counts in this very carefully at regular intervals and reports as follows: The poisoned cotton was 27 per cent infested at the time of starting the applications. This infestation gradually receded until on August 2 it was only 23 per cent. At the time the poisoning was started the unpoisoned portion of the cut was 23 per cent infested. This infestation increased rapidly until on August 2 it had reached 83 per cent, or practically a complete infestation. In other words, the treatment on the poisoned portion of this cut by August 2 had held the infestation from 83 to 23 per cent. In another case two adjoining fields slightly over 9 acres in extent were selected for comparison, one being poisoned and the other left untreated. On July 24 the field to be poisoned was 33.4 per cent infested and the first application was made that day. On July 29 this had receded to 8.6 per cent, and on August 2 the infestation in this cut was only 2 per cent. The other field, separated from this poisoned one by only a ditch, was 11.7 per cent on July 24, and increased to 18 per cent on July 29 and 25.6 per cent on August 2. In other words, during the period July 24 to August 2 the poisoned field was reduced in infestation from 33 per cent to 2 per cent, while the unpoisoned field increased from 11 per cent to 25 per cent.

Very truly, yours,

B. R. COAD.
In Charge Delta Laboratory.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am delighted to hear what the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has said. It seems to me if the reports are true that the mission of the United States is through as far as further investigation and the discovery of a substance to do away with the boll weevil is concerned. That being the case, I look for the appropriation in the next Agricultural appropriation bill to be very much less than it has been for this particular work.

I am delighted to learn these facts, although I have received a number of letters, but not as many as the Senator has, with relation to this poison. I wish to ask the Senator if the Agricultural Department discovered this poison or was it discovered by some one outside the department?

Mr. RANSDELL. It was discovered by the Agricultural Department, acting through Mr. Coad, their entomologist, at a small station and a very inexpensive one, let me add, in Tallulah, Madison Parish, La. Mr. Coad has been in charge of it for several years and has done magnificent work.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. My impression is that this experiment was carried on in the delta part of Mississippi, and Tallulah is in the delta part of Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. It is in the delta part of Louisiana.

Mr. HARRISON. They have not tried it as they desire to try it in the hill section. In the last Agricultural appropriation bill, while the estimated appropriation was cut, they still have enough to carry on some experiments in the hill section.

Mr. SMOOT. But the experiments in Georgia proved to be exactly the same and gave the same results, I understand.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think there is any doubt but it will give the same result, but they have not carried it to an extent in the hill section that they desire.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if it is a success it will be carried to every cotton field in the United States and perhaps in the world.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to thank the Senator from Utah for his interest in this matter. While the experiment has been pretty thoroughly tested, as was stated by the Senator from Mississippi, in the rich lowlands of the Mississippi Delta, where cotton grows very high and the vegetation is rank, it has not been tested experimentally so as to direct people how to carry on the poisoning in the hill section, and it is desired to have some additional appropriation for that purpose. I hope the Secretary of Agriculture will request it in his next recommendation to Congress and that he will be given whatever is required.

Before sitting down I wish to add that personally I am conducting this experiment myself on 400 acres of my cotton this year. My manager, Thomas H. Estes, and his assistant, Curtis Grayson, have written me a number of times in the last few weeks in the most encouraging manner telling me about how they have reduced the infestation of the boll weevil and how nicely the cotton is getting along under the poisoning process, much better than where it has not been poisoned. Hence I feel that I have derived very great personal benefit from the application of this poison and wish the people throughout the cotton belt could know about it.

LETTER OF GOV. CLEMENT, OF VERMONT.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I have received from the private secretary of Gov. Clement, of Vermont, a letter reading:

I am directed by Gov. Clement to forward you the within inclosed letter, which the governor has written to-day to the governor of West Virginia.

The letter is certified, and I should like to have it go into the RECORD, if there is no objection.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 13, 1919.

Hon. JOHN J. CORNWELL,
Governor of West Virginia, Charleston, W. Va.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: Replying to your favor of August 5, I am utterly opposed to the confiscation of the railroad properties by the Federal Government for the benefit of railroad employees, and I agree with you that the demand of the railroad brotherhoods should be met with a firm refusal by all of the States of the Union.

Government operation of utilities is, in my opinion, unwise and fundamentally wrong. It is a centralization of power in the Federal Government, which is sure to bring trouble and disaster to the Nation. It will result in such a breakdown of transportation service as we have seen in the railroad operation during the last two years. Aside from these objections it is a serious menace to the States of the Union in that it would deplete our revenues to such an extent that we should be obliged to increase our local tax rates upon property to an enormous extent.

I will join you in asking the proper committees of the Congress to be heard upon this most important question which has ever faced this country since its foundation.

Very sincerely, yours,

PERCIVAL W. CLEMENT,
Governor.

DEPORTATION OF ALIENS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I present a resolution adopted by Hoquiam Post, No. 16, of the American Legion, urging legislation to deport aliens who made application for naturalization but who renounced their declaration in order to escape military service during the war. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Immigration, and I hope that the committee will give the bill which has been introduced and which is now pending before that committee due consideration.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have received a number of petitions of a similar character and also a large number of letters from various parts of the United States asking that the bill to which the Senator from Washington has just referred be extended and that there be deported from the United States not only aliens who were interned during the war and have been since released on parole, but that there also be deported from the United States aliens who belong to various so-called criminal organizations, such as the I. W. W. and the Bolshevist organizations, which seek the destruction of our Government by force and advocate resistance by violence to the enforcement of the law. I have not seen fit to bring all those letters and petitions here. Some of them I have referred and some I shall refer to the committee without presenting them to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Immigration.

REPORT ON LEATHER AND SHOE INDUSTRIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Federal Trade Commission, transmitting a report of the leather and shoe industries in part covering the period from 1914 to 1917, inclusive, and in part covering the period from 1914 to 1918, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4437) to provide revenue for the Government and to promote the production of tungsten ores and manufactures thereof in the United States, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present a petition from approximately 2,000 retail grocers of Texas in behalf of the Kendrick-Kenyon bill to regulate meat packers. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY (for Mr. GRONNA) presented a memorial from the Farm Bureau Federations of Iowa, Nebraska, Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois, relative to the causes of the high cost of living, etc., which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also (for Mr. GRONNA) presented a petition of the Stanislaus County Farmers' Union (Inc.), of California, praying for the imposition of a tariff on the importation of beans into this country, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I present a joint memorial from the Legislature of the State of Montana, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the joint memorial was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 4.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas prices of staple articles of trade, under the stimulus of the abnormal relationship of supply and demand existing during the war, advanced to abnormally high levels; and

Whereas speculators, in combination with producers and dealers in such staple articles of trade, are in many instances maintaining prices to those abnormally high levels by artificial means not based upon the economic laws of supply and demand, but made possible by sympathetic groups of such speculators possessed of large resources and in control of sufficiently large percentages of the total supply of such staple articles of trade as to arbitrarily fix the market prices of such articles; and

Whereas the aggregate profits being so exacted of the ultimate consumer of such staple articles of trade is unconscionable, unjust, and oppressive; and

Whereas it has long been accepted as within the province of liberal governments to prohibit the exaction of unconscionable profits on money loaned as the medium of trade: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana assembled in extraordinary session, does petition the Congress of the United States to prohibit by law the exaction of such unconscionable profits on staple articles of interstate commerce; that persons and corporations engaged in interstate business be licensed by the United States Government to carry on such interstate business that the annual net profits legally chargeable by such persons and corporations from such commerce be limited to a fair aggregate profit, based upon the reasonable and economic production cost of the article delivered to the ultimate consumer, as modified by the risk involved in the trade and prior losses of the trader in the business; and to this end that the Congress of the United States, either directly or through a commission to be by it created, fix the maximum aggregate profits legally chargeable by the producer, middleman, and retailer, upon the various classes of articles of such interstate commerce; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be and he is hereby directed to transmit copies of this memorial, duly authenticated, to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Montana.

President of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I present a joint memorial from the Legislature of the State of Montana, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the joint memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial 3.

A memorial to the Congress of the United States to enact such legislation as may be necessary and effective for the purpose of enabling the several public-land States, or any duly constituted irrigation district organized under the laws thereof, to acquire rights of way upon, over, and across Government lands within national forests, for the construction of dams, reservoirs, and other necessary conveniences.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the members of the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, in extraordinary session assembled, the senate and house concurring, respectively represent: That—

Whereas there exists an urgent need throughout the several western public-land States for the storage of flood waters, in order that they may be used for the purpose of irrigating vast areas of cultivated and irrigable lands at such seasons of the year as the regular flow of the rivers, creeks, and springs have either been diminished or entirely depleted; and

Whereas Montana has particularly suffered severely from drought during the years of 1917, 1918, and 1919; and

Whereas there exists within the boundaries of the State of Montana many valuable reservoir sites, capable of empounding millions of cubic feet of flood waters that otherwise would run to waste; and

Whereas in a great many instances such reservoir sites are located within the boundaries of the national forest: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana in extraordinary session assembled, do hereby petition:

That the Congress of the United States enact such legislation as may be necessary and effective to enable the several public-land States, or any duly constituted irrigation district organized under the laws thereof, to acquire rights of way upon, over, and across Government lands within national forests, for the construction, maintenance, and operation of dams, reservoirs, and other necessary conveniences for the storage and husbanding of waters for irrigation purposes on lands without said national forests; together with the right to store, divert, convey, and use in and by means of said dams, reservoirs, and other necessary conveniences waters rising within or passing through said national forests; and the further right to construct, maintain, and operate ditches and flumes and aqueducts within said national forests for the purpose of conveying said waters so accumulated, stored, and husbanded in said dams, reservoirs, and other necessary conveniences to suitable points of outlet from said national forests to places of intended use; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be transmitted by the secretary of state of Montana to both Houses of the National Congress and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Montana, with the request that they use every effort within their power to bring about the enactment of such legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I present a joint memorial from the Legislature of the State of Montana, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

There being no objection, the joint memorial was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial No. 4.

A memorial to the Congress of the United States urging the appropriating of $50,000,000 for work on Government irrigation projects in the West.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, in extraordinary session assembled, do hereby urgently recommend that you promptly enact legislation appropriating the sum of $50,000,000 for work on Government irrigation projects throughout the West.

The long extended drought prevailing throughout Montana has rendered more storage and use of water for irrigation purposes a problem of grave importance, and as the projects undertaken by the United States Reclamation Service are entirely under Federal control the individual State is powerless to aid in their completion.

The farmers of Montana exerted their utmost efforts and staked their entire resources in response to every call of the United States Government for increased crop production and for the raising of funds for the different purposes required in the prosecution of the World War. And because of the unprecedented drought conditions during the last three seasons, and especially the season of 1919, the many farmers of Montana are faced with the disastrous effects of such drought clearly demonstrating the great need and necessity of said appropriation for the purpose of storing and retaining the vast quantity of the flood waters which flow to waste each year, which if made available would reclaim a vast acreage of the lands of the State and make them more certain and profitable for the raising of such crops as are necessary for the support of the Nation in time of peace or war.

For all of which reasons we urgently recommend the speedy enactment of the proposed legislation as embodying a sound business policy applied to a great national problem.

The Secretary of the State of Montana is hereby directed to transmit by wire and in writing copies of this memorial to the President of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Secretary of the Interior, and to the Montana Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I present a joint memorial from the Legislature of the State of Montana, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the joint memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial 5.

Memorializing Congress of the United States for the passage of legislation for the relief of entrymen on the public lands of the United States under the homestead act.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas a large portion of the sections of the State of Montana now stricken by drought are lands which have been filed upon by settlers under the homestead act of the United States; and

Whereas the crops in said sections have, by reason of the drought, been in most instances a total failure; and

Whereas the entrymen under said homestead act of the said public lands of the United States within the State of Montana are unable to borrow funds on their said lands to assist in the development of said lands or in maintaining the said entrymen and their families upon said lands; and

Whereas by reason of said drought an emergency exists in the said State of Montana affecting the said homestead settlers: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the State of Montana, in extra session assembled, the Senate concurring, does respectfully petition the Congress of the United States for the passage of some relief legislation shortening the period of residence required under the laws of the United States for acquiring title to public lands under the homestead act and for such proper legislation as may relieve the entrymen from some of the burdens incident to the period of residence in order to acquire title to their said lands under the homestead laws as the same now exist and for such further legislation as will assist the homestead entrymen within the State of Montana in perfecting their title to their said homestead entries and using the same commercially to assist the said entrymen in improving the said lands and providing sustenance for themselves and their families; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the State of Montana transmit copies of this memorial to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the Senators and Representatives from the State of Montana, with the request that they use every effort to secure the immediate passage of such legislation.

He also presented telegrams in the nature of petitions from sundry Greek citizens of Haverhill, Worcester, and Fitchburg, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying that Thrace, Macedonia, Epirus, and Dodecanese be annexed to Greece, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Oregon, praying for reservations to the league of nations covenant which will safeguard the independence and sovereignty of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Augusta, Ark., praying for the passage of the so-called Kenyon-Kendrick bill providing for Federal control of the meat-packing industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of sundry citizens of Three Rivers, Albion, and Lenawee County, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Pomona Grange, No. 15, Patrons of Husbandry, of Lenawee County, Mich., praying for the return to private ownership of the railroads of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of Pomona Grange, No. 15, Patrons of Husbandry, of Lenawee County, Mich., remonstrating against the proposed plan of the Secretary of the Interior to reclaim desert and swamp lands, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of the Federation of Labor, of Detroit, Mich., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the vocational rehabilitation act, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 1330, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for Federal control of the food supply, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 97, National Brotherhood of Operative Potters, of Mount Clemens, Mich., praying for the exemption of wines and beer from prohibition, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry postal employees of Hastings, Mich., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Napa, Calif., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COLT presented a memorial of sundry Polish citizens of Providence, R. I., remonstrating against unwarranted statements being made against the Polish Nation, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Employers' Association of the State of Rhode Island, praying for the return to private ownership of the railroads of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. PAGE presented a memorial of Local Branch, Granite Cutters' International Association, of Barre, Vt., remonstrating against the prohibition of beer and light wines, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. I present a resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Georgia concerning Federal pensions. I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the losses sustained by the Southern States as a result of the War between the States were $4,000,000,000, value of emancipated slaves; $25,000,000, proceeds of captured and abandoned property of the South; and $68,000,000 of taxes collected for cotton tax of 1867 and 1868, which has been adjudged by the Supreme Court of the United States as an illegal tax, which sums of money were actually paid into the Treasury of the Government and paid out for its uses; and

Whereas these vast sums of money have actually been received and the damage done the South more than 55 years ago as a seeming indemnity held against a conquered province rather than States of the American Union for exercising a right that had previously been conceded; and

Whereas the generation of the South who actually sustained this great loss are fast passing away and the several States are burdened with the cost of making provision for them; and

Whereas the United States Government has by law provided a pension system for the soldiers of the North who enlisted in the Armies known as the Federal Army, which has been paid for the past 30 years by a tax levied on the whole country that has been paid by the South as well as by the North; and

Whereas the people of the Southern States have paid their part for the past 30 years, the annual sum of $50,000,000 or more, in support of the pension burden of the Government, and received no part of it in return; and

Whereas the people of the South now representing the business interests, and who have to carry this pension burden, are thus situated: When the people of the North pay the tax it goes into the Treasury of the Government, but annually it goes back to their section in payment of the pension; they get it back, put it into use in their upbuilding and prosperity; but when the South pays their part of this pension it never comes back, but goes all across the line to pay the pensions of the North and to add to their success and prosperity, which is an unjust burden carried by generations of loyal and pure Americans for the acts of their fathers of more than half a century ago; and

Whereas there should be some return made to the Southern States of this large sum of money obtained from the sale of captured and abandoned property and from the illegal cotton tax which was actually paid into the Treasury of the Government and used by them for the last 50 years; and

Whereas the only relief that can be suggested for the United States Government, through the Congress, the law making provision to provide for the payment of a sufficient sum through the Treasury Department for each State to amply provide for the old slaves who are now unable to work for a support, which his master was compelled to give him by the State, and to furnish a sufficient sum to each State, to be used to pay pensions fixed by the laws of each State to each Confederate soldier and to the widows of such soldiers as are now provided for by the States: Therefore be it

Resolved first, That the Southern States with the existing population ought to be by this present Congress now in session entirely relieved of the burden of pensions to Confederate veterans by its National Government taking that burden upon itself, preferably using the pension-law methods and officers of the different States as the best and already existing agencies for the correct discharge of this duty, and that the grading and classifying of the amount of pension should be made the same, and no less, for the Confederate veterans, widows of officers or privates, than in like cases to Union veterans.

Resolved second, That a fair and just pension should be made by the United States Government to each negro man and woman born and reared in slavery, the laws of every Southern State required the master to bestow upon him or her.

Resolved third, That a copy of these resolutions be without delay forwarded by his excellency the governor to His Excellency President Wilson, at Washington, and a copy to each Senator and to each Representative in Congress from Georgia, with request that appropriate legislation be enacted by the National Government without delay for carrying same into effect.

Mr. HARRIS. I present a resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Georgia, relative to an investigation into the high cost of living. I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the high cost of living shows no tendency toward any reduction and steadily mounts higher and higher day after day; and

Whereas the price of all kinds of meat is at an exorbitant figure and is rapidly reaching a condition where the poorer classes can not buy it at all; and

Whereas it is charged by many well-informed persons that this is due to the control of the meat market by a few well-known packers, who are reaping an excessive amount of profit therefrom: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives, That we ask the Congressmen and Senators from Georgia to give their influence and support to all measures and movements in Congress proposing to investigate and correct all combinations in food products, and especially the packing industry.

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be mailed each Congressman and Senator by the clerk of the house of representatives duly attested under his official seal.

Mr. HARRIS. I present a resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Georgia, favoring the enactment of legislation providing six months' additional pay for all honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines. I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas there is pending in the Congress of the United States a bill which proposes to pay all honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, serving in the late European war, a sum of money equivalent to six months' pay; and

Whereas it is just and desirable that these discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines be provided with sum in order that they may tide over that period of time required to readjust themselves to civilian life: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Georgia, That we indorse such a bill providing for six months' pay as aforesaid, and recommend to our Senators and Congressmen that they support the same.

Mr. HARRIS. I present a resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Georgia, relative to the passage of the so-called Fordney bill, the purpose of which is to place a high duty on potash. I ask that the resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas a bill is pending before Congress known as the Fordney bill, the purpose of which is to place a high duty on potash imported into this country; and

Whereas potash is a most essential ingredient for fertilizers, and the imposition of such a duty would tend directly to increase the cost of production of foodstuffs and cotton: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the State of Georgia memorialize Congress protesting against the passage of this bill, and the clerk of the house be, and he is hereby, instructed to send a copy of this resolution to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, the author of the bill, Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY, and each of the Senators and Representatives from Georgia.

LAND IN THE CANAL ZONE.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6222) to remove a certain tract or lots of land in Cristobal, Canal Zone, from the operation and effect of the Executive order of the President of December 5, 1912, pursuant to the act of Congress of August 24, 1912 (37 Stats., chap. 390, p. 565), asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, which was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2733) to provide for the training of officers of the Army in aeronautic engineering and the issue of equipment and materials therefor, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 156) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2734) to authorize the transportation of civilians across the Atlantic Ocean upon Army transports under such rules and regulations and at such rates as the Secretary of War may prescribe, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 157) thereon.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2497) to provide for the payment of six months' pay to the widow, children, or other designated dependent relative of any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Army whose death results from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 158) thereon.

DROUGHT SUFFERERS IN MONTANA.

Mr. SPENCER. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably, with amendments, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 87) authorizing the President to distribute food supplies to drought-stricken territory, and I submit a report (No. 159) thereon.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The joint resolution just reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] deals with a matter of very great urgency, and I should like to ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if it is going to lead to any discussion?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If so, I shall withdraw the request.

Mr. KIRBY. What is the joint resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The title of the joint resolution will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 87) authorizing the President to distribute food supplies to drought-stricken territory.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Montana explain the joint resolution?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask that the joint resolution be read as proposed to be amended by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as amended, as follows:

Whereas an extraordinary and unprecedented drought resulting in almost total failure of crops in the State of Montana has occasioned great destitution therein: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe and to the extent that, in his judgment, at the time of distribution, the exigencies of the service require, is hereby authorized to distribute for the relief of families in Montana in 1919 who are in need, in consequence of total or partial loss of crop, occasioned by such drought, the whole or any part of such excess of food supplies now held by or under the control of the War Department as would otherwise be allotted to said State.

Mr. SMOOT. There are other States in the West that have suffered, I presume, just as much as has the State of Montana on account of the drought, and it seems to me that if we are going to begin the free distribution of food by the Government on account of the drought it ought to extend to more than that State.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I recognize the justice of the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah, and I drafted the joint resolution accordingly, intending to make it applicable to all the States in a similar situation, but the committee in its wisdom has proposed the amendment. I shall be very glad if the Senate will disagree to the amendment in that regard proposed by the committee and leave the joint resolution as originally drawn, authorizing the President to make this distribution in any State in which destitution exists by reason of the extraordinary drought which has prevailed in many sections of the West. I know that the conditions are quite similar in the adjacent States of Utah, Idaho, Wyoming, and to some extent in Colorado and western North and South Dakota.

Mr. SMOOT. I know there are some districts in my State that have not produced one-third of a crop; and I know that there are districts in Idaho in the same condition; but I really do not feel justified in asking that Utah be included. I think the people of Utah can take care of those within her borders who are suffering because of the drought. I do not speak of this because of the State of Utah, for I do not want the Government of the United States to render assistance because of the drought that has stricken the people of that State; but I do think that if there is going to be legislation along this line it ought to be, as the Senator himself says, general rather than specific. I hope that the amendment reported by the committee will not be agreed to. If we are going to do this thing, let us do it right. In saying this, I wish it distinctly understood, even though the joint resolution passes in its original form, I do not wish it to apply to the State of Utah, because, I repeat, the people of Utah will take care of their own sufferers.

Mr. THOMAS. The difficulty is that if the joint resolution is not restricted to the State of Montana it will have to cover all of the States any portion of whose people may feel justified in claiming this relief. The difficulty then would be, first, the extent to which it should be made applicable, and, second, the establishment of a precedent which is bound to come home many times to plague us. I am perfectly willing, in view of the representations made to the committee this morning, to grant this relief to the people of Montana because of the unusually distressing plight in which they find themselves consequent upon drought conditions, but beyond that I am unwilling to go.

Mr. SMOOT. From what has been stated to me by Senators, the joint resolution is going to lead to discussion, and I will ask the Senator from Montana to withdraw his request at this time and take the matter up to-morrow.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In that case I give notice that at the close of morning business on the next succeeding legislative day I shall ask for the consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

ENFORCEMENT OF PROHIBITION IN CANAL ZONE.

Mr. BORAH. From the Committee on Interoceanic Canals I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 1273) to prohibit intoxicating liquors and prostitution within the Canal Zone, and for other purposes. A similar bill passed the Senate last session, and in view of that fact I am going to ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. KING. Permit me to inquire of the Senator if the bill could not be properly attached to the measure which was reported by the Judiciary Committee the other day by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], who was chairman of the subcommittee and is in charge of the bill?

Mr. BORAH. It is the same general subject, and perhaps it might go over.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the present consideration of the bill. I merely invite the attention of the Senator to the bill reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BORAH. This is the same as the bill which passed the Senate at the last session, and that is the reason why I asked unanimous consent, but I will not urge it if anyone wishes to look into it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to confirm what the Senator from Arizona has said. I visited Panama last spring and the same state of fact was called to my attention to which the Senator from Arizona has referred. A similar bill passed the Senate at the last session without objection, and I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the bill now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator to misunderstand me. We have the whole subject before us in a bill which will follow the leasing bill, and I merely suggested to the Senator from Idaho that it might be well to consolidate into one measure all this prohibition legislation. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill if Senators feel that they would like a separate measure instead of consolidating all such legislation into one great measure.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not understand that a bill was pending covering the Panama Canal Zone situation.

Mr. STERLING. I do not think it does in terms, and I was just about to say that I would be glad, as I think the Committee on the Judiciary would, to give consideration to the bill reported by the Senator from Idaho; but I have no objection to its passage at this time.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection to the bill, but I think that it had better go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota:

A bill (S. 2868) for the relief of Julia Dezera Stewart (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FALL:

A bill (S. 2869) granting an increase of pension to Albert N. Hopkins (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2870) granting an increase of pension to John Kelly (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. RANSDELL:

A bill (S. 2871) for the relief of the New Orleans-Belize Royal Mail & Central American Steamship Co., of New Orleans, La.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 2872) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Pendleton, Oreg., a captured German cannon; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 2873) for the appropriation of additional funds for the purchase of a site and the erection of a Federal building at Spanish Fork, Utah; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. SMITH of Arizona:

A bill (S. 2874) granting to the State of Arizona the right to levy, assess, and collect from the United States of America a special, direct tax on all public lands included within the limits of forest reservations, national parks, and national monuments in the State of Arizona; to the Committee on Public Lands.

MAJ. GEN. E. H. CROWDER.

Mr. KNOX. I introduce a bill and, as it is very brief, I ask to have it read for the information of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 2867) to authorize the President, when Maj. Gen. Crowder retires, to place him on the retired list of the Army as a lieutenant general was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in view of the long and faithful services of Maj. Gen. E. H. Crowder, Judge Advocate General of the United States Army, and especially his conspicuous services as Provost Marshal General in conjunction with the various State and Territorial executives and the local and district boards in the execution of the selective service law, the President is hereby authorized, when that officer retires, to place him on the retired list of the Army as a lieutenant general, with the pay and emoluments of that grade, and to grant him a commission in accordance with such advanced rank.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania has asked for the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. KNOX. Oh, no; I have merely asked that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

OFFICE OF ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN.

Mr. CALDER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 172), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Whereas the trading-with-the-enemy act passed by Congress, approved on the 6th day of October, 1917, provided for the office of Alien Property Custodian; and

Whereas under such authorization the President appointed A. Mitchell Palmer, who held the position until the 3d day of March, 1919, at which time he was succeeded by Francis P. Garvan; and

Whereas in the conduct of said office they have administered upon nearly 40,000 separate estates or trusts, having an aggregate value of nearly $1,000,000,000; and

Whereas under the provisions of said act they have exercised the right to make numerous appointments of lawyers, directors, supervisors, clerks, assistants, and accountants, and have exercised the right to fix, allow, and pay to the individuals so appointed by them such compensation as they might determine, and have exercised the right to designate numerous banks and trust companies as depositaries of the proceeds of sale of alien property which has come into their possession; and

Whereas the President, on or about October 12, 1917, vested in the Alien Property Custodian "the executive administration of all of the provisions of section 7 (a), section 7 (c), and section 7 (d) of the trading-with-the-enemy act," including, among other things, the power "to require the conveyance, transfer, assignment, delivery, or payment to himself at such time and in such manner as he shall prescribe of any moneys or other properties owing to or belonging to or held for, by, or on account of, or on behalf of, or for the benefit of any enemy or ally of an enemy which, after an investigation, said Alien Property Custodian shall determine is so owing, or so belongs, or is so held"; and

Whereas under the provisions of Subdivision C of section 7 of the trading-with-the-enemy act "no person shall be liable in any court for or in respect to anything done or omitted in pursuance of any order, rule, or regulations by the President under the authority of this act"; and

Whereas it is possible that after peace shall have been declared claims may be made against the United States for the recovery of moneys and for the value of property which it may be alleged have been taken by the Alien Property Custodian without authority; and

Whereas any bond which has been furnished by the Alien Property Custodian, if any such bond has been furnished, can under the circumstances provide for a penalty of not more than a nominal amount; and

Whereas said A. Mitchell Palmer has publicly declared his desire that his administration of the office of Alien Property Custodian be fully investigated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That a special committee be selected by the Senate to consist of five Senators, three of whom shall be members of the majority party and two of the minority party, which committee is hereby directed to examine and audit the accounts of said A. Mitchell Palmer as Alien Property Custodian and of said Francis P. Garvan as Alien Property Custodian, and to investigate the administration by them of said office from the date of their respective appointments to the present time; and be it further

Resolved, That said committee be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to proceed with such investigation without unnecessary delay; to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths; to employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in pursuance hereof; to sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate, and at any place, either Washington, D. C., or elsewhere, as may be deemed proper by the committee; to employ such counsel and expert and other assistants as may be deemed necessary by the committee; and to report its conclusions to the Senate as speedily as possible; the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 4437. An act to provide revenue for the Government and to promote the production of tungsten ores and manufactures thereof in the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2775, which is known as the oil-leasing bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McKellar	Smoot
Ball	Harding	McNary	Spencer
Bankhead	Harris	Moses	Sterling
Borah	Harrison	Myers	Sutherland
Brandegee	Henderson	Nelson	Thomas
Calder	Hitchcock	Norris	Townsend
Capper	Johnson, Calif.	Nugent	Trammell
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Wadsworth
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	Kellogg	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Dial	Kenyon	Pittman	Warren
Fall	King	Poindexter	Watson
Fernald	Kirby	Pomerene	Williams
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Ransdell	Wolcott
Gay	La Follette	Robinson
Gerry	Lenroot	Sheppard
Gronna	Lodge	Smith, Md.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is necessarily absent on public business. I wish also to announce that the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], and the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] are absent on official business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. EDGE] on account of illness in his family.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

PEACE TREATY—INDUSTRIAL CONDITIONS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the acrimonious and widely prevalent controversy over the proposed league of nations, which has been waging in America since January last, has centered itself upon the 26 articles of part 1 of the pending treaty. A listening and attentive public have doubtless assumed, and justly so, that these articles comprise and cover the subject.

Everyone by this time who is familiar with the debates and press discussions must be fairly familiar with the structure of the league as outlined and embodied in the recitals of these articles, for it is quite natural to suppose that a subject of such vast importance and of so much strife has been discussed to tatters and that no part of it has been overlooked or ignored. It may therefore interest those who have not familiarized themselves with the contents of the treaty to be told that part 1 does not embrace the entire scheme of the league, but that part 13, comprising 42 articles, contains a portion, and a very essential portion, of that scheme. Everyone who has written or spoken upon the subject must have known this. Every Senator knows it. Only a few days ago we authorized the President by resolution to invite the delegates to the annual conference of 1919, which it creates, to meet in this city next October. Even that resolution failed to evoke any discussion of the subject.

It is perhaps pertinent to add, Mr. President, that since these words were written a discussion of the treaty has been held between the Committee on Foreign Relations and the President, in which no reference whatever was made to part 13. I can only account for this anomaly upon the theory that the Foreign Relations Committee craft was somewhat water-logged with presidential ballast and preferred the seclusion of the shore to a possible storm at sea.

We can not estimate either the wisdom or the expediency of the league of nations without a fairly complete understanding of all its essential elements, and no one will deny the far-reaching importance of the provisions of part 13, which by the express recitals of article 392 are a "part of the organization of the league."

My reflections upon the subject have, therefore, necessarily included the 41 articles of part 13 as essential integers of the plan. It is to that part of the treaty, therefore, that I invite the attention of the Senate.

It possesses one or two unique features. It is not the product of the international congress at Versailles, but of a labor commission of that conference, composed of delegates from nine nations—the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, Cuba, Poland, and Czechoslovakia. It was presented to the Versailles congress on April 11, which later made it an integral part of the treaty, with a few unimportant changes of phraseology.

On May 20 last the President cabled to Secretary Tumulty that—

> The labor program which the conference of peace has adopted as a part of the treaty of peace constitutes one of the most important achievements of the new day, in which the interests of labor are to be systematically and intelligently safeguarded and promoted. Amid the multitude of other interests this great step forward is apt to be overlooked, and yet no other single thing that has been done will help more to stabilize conditions of labor throughout the world and ultimately relieve the unhappy conditions which in too many places have prevailed. Personally I regard this as one of the most gratifying achievements of the conference.

This program, when given to the peace congress and to the public, was accompanied by an official introduction, to which I shall later have occasion to refer. It is of interest to note in passing that the French and Italian delegations sought, without success, to secure representation for agricultural interests, which many regard as of considerable importance in the arena of production.

Inasmuch as organized labor speaks, and correctly speaks, of itself as a class, it is entirely appropriate to say that by including this program in the treaty distinct recognition and separate organization are given to a class, doubtless because indispensable to the adjustment of a world controversy and to the establishment of a permanent and enduring peace. If it is so essential, it should be accepted for that reason if for no other. Yet it would seem to the casual thinker more or less familiar with history that such a policy would permanently accentuate, instead of removing, class distinctions, and that to do this is to challenge the doctrine of equality before the law, so long asserted and so successfully defended as the corner stone of a true democracy. It would also seem to encourage farmers, manufacturers, merchants, and the learned professions to demand similar recognition by the establishment of international bureaus and governing bodies equipped with authority to safeguard their welfare and secure their continued existence. I suggest this thought in all seriousness, for they are the weaker elements of modern society. Compared with the political and economic power of modern industrial organizations, they are collectively as Gulliver to his giants.

Classes to some extent exist, and always will exist in society, whatever its political institutions and however drastic the efforts to destroy them. They are inseparable from the differences and inequalities of man's physical and mental endowment. They may be disciplined, they may be controlled, they may be minimized, but they can not be eradicated. Lenin may butcher every suspected bourgeois and aristocrat and every member of the intelligentia; yet class will persist among his proletariat. He and his fellow butcher, Trotski, with the commanders of their armies and all in authority under them, are of a class separate and apart from their masses. They are a living and bloody example of the hopeless fallacy they proclaim and blindly follow. To enthrone a class, whether by revolution or by treaty, is but to estrange other classes and to sow the seed of new ones. Those formulating the great treaty now before us were far wiser than I, infinitely more familiar with the conditions confronting them and with the formulas for their alleviation. I challenge neither their judgment nor their statesmanship. No man hopes more fervently than I do that, should their great work be accepted by the nations and placed into practical operation, it may dissipate every doubt and confound every criticism which its details have inspired, including my own. But that prospect does not seem encouraging.

The objects to be subserved by part 13, which are of special and urgent importance, are specified in article 427. They are nine in number, "without claiming that they are either complete or final."

They are said to be "methods and principles for regulating labor conditions which all industrial communities should endeavor to apply, so far as their special circumstances will permit"; and it is expressly recognized "that differences of climate, habits, and customs of economic opportunity and industrial tradition make strict uniformity in the conditions of labor difficult of immediate attainment." Fairly construed this would seem to mean that strict uniformity in these conditions is the ultimate goal, as it is the immediate one in countries where the differences recited do not exist or are merely negligible. Excluding the first object, which is definition, the general principles are the right of association for all lawful purposes, the payment of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as understood in their time and country, the adoption of an eight-hour day where it has not already been obtained, a weekly rest of at least 24 hours, including Sunday wherever practicable, the abolition of child labor and limitations on the labor of young persons as will permit their mental and physical development, equal pay to men and women for work of equal value, application of a country's standards to all workers lawfully resident therein, and inspection systems in which women should take part to enforce laws and regulations for the protection of the employed. These, as far as enumerated, are properly asserted to be "well fitted to guide the policy of the league of nations."

Uniformity of laws, customs, requirements, and procedure has so far been unattainable within itself by any great nation with diversified population and industry. This is notably true of a federated Republic like ours, whose domestic concerns are ostensibly beyond the jurisdiction of the Federal authority. How they can be made to approximate a world-wide uniformity is a problem too vast and complex for my powers of comprehension. Its contemplation makes Utopia seem commonplace. Equal pay to the sexes, the right of association, eight hours for a day's work, are possible, and most of them are operative in America. But eight hours a day in sub-Arctic and Antarctic regions, wages, child labor, inspection laws, and "standards set by law" will swiftly set wage earners by the ears in many parts of the world before attempts at uniformity proceed very far. And this is true if we consider only countries differing so little as the United States and Canada with Great Britain and France. Between them wages and product per capita vary widely, as do standards of living. Yet we can not imagine the representatives of the two last countries accepting league terms less favorable than those enjoyed in the former, nor Poland and Italy accepting those less favorable than Great Britain and France, and so on down the line. And leveling upward will overburden industry to ruin on the one hand, while leveling downward will be forcibly resisted if need be on the other.

It is contended by the advocates of tariffs for protection that the higher wage of the American workman is due to the system without which the European level of wage would prevail. I dissent from this claim, although I concede that a high duty theoretically tends in that direction. But those who believe it must perceive that equality of labor conditions is not attainable without equality of tariff duties, or with none at all. The one is as unattainable as the other. The problem involves tariffs not only but production, exchange, and markets as well.

It may be possible to reach the goal of uniformity in the conditions of labor, but I question if it can be done otherwise than by making the standard of the lowest and leveling down to it. It is conceivably possible to bring the mountain crest to the level of the sea, from whose vast surface all heights and depths are measured. It is conceivably possible that the intellect of Mr. Lloyd-George may accommodate itself to the capacity of his dullest follower. But the sea can not clamber and cling to the mountain side, nor the everyday man acquire the comprehension and wield the power of Europe's leading statesman. Nature's processes are uniform and her laws unyielding, while her resources, her products, her domain, and her children abound in vast and everlasting inequalities. If this be so, and I am convinced that it can not be refuted, then strict uniformity, mediate or immediate, in world labor conditions can be attained only at the expense of the American wage earner. His superior skill, intelligence, productive capacity, and opportunities can avail him but little. These must be trimmed and attenuated and his faculties atrophied to a standard within the reach of all. He will not and should not submit to the lowering process. If he did, he would commit industrial suicide, and his country's material well-being would perish with him. I can not avoid the conclusion, therefore, that these articles designed for his physical and spiritual improvement may make him the equivalent of the continental wage earner.

It is asserted that wealth is the product of labor. If this assertion includes mental with manual labor it is largely true. Hence the subject of part 13 intimately concerns itself with industry in its manifold forms. Uniformity, strict or otherwise, in labor conditions can be obtained only by effecting many and radical changes in the methods and activities of production, distribution, and consumption. And this brings the economic and domestic concerns of the members of the league within the range of the machinery and procedure of the international labor office. They must either enact or ratify its recommendations and draft conventions to that end, or by rejecting them defeat the operations of the league and bring its beneficent purposes to naught. Such an alternative is not desirable. It is less alluring. But we shall confront it sooner or later when the treaty is ratified and the league becomes operative.

It is appropriate at this point to consider some of these articles in detail. The first chapter of the first section deals with organization, the second with procedure.

By article 387 the original members of the league of nations are made the original members of the organization, and later memberships of the former are equivalent to memberships of the latter.

By article 388 the permanent organization is made to consist of a general conference of representatives of the members and an international labor office controlled by a governing body.

By article 389 provision is made for an annual meeting of the general conference of representatives of the members. Each member shall have four representatives, two of whom shall be government delegates and two of whom shall represent respectively the employers and work people of each member; the latter to be nominated in agreement with the industrial organizations, if they exist. But the credentials of these delegates shall be subject to the scrutiny of the conference, which may, by a two-thirds vote of the delegates present, "refuse to admit any delegate or adviser whom it deems not to have been nominated in accordance with this article." The same right to reject appears in article 412, providing for the constitution of a commission of inquiry to try members cited for delinquency.

The reservation in a treaty of the right to inspect the credentials and character of the emissaries of foreign governments to be appointed thereunder is extraordinary. Exequaturs may be withheld from foreign ambassadors and ministers who are persona non grata for any satisfactory reason to the nation receiving them. But these delegates are not ambassadors nor ministers representing their governments abroad. They are delegates to a common body of which they are constituent units. By these articles their commissions are to be submitted to a sort of committee on credentials, which by a two-thirds vote may reject them. This is not a fanciful statement. The subject was recently called to the notice of the Secretary of State, when he appeared before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, by the Senator from North Dakota. I quote from the printed hearings:

Senator McCUMBER. Under that provision (article 412) if this Government sends a representative selected by this Government, this world labor union can say to the United States: "We refuse to recognize the delegate whom you have sent to us, because we doubt whether his views comport with ours upon certain things in the treaty." Is not that the meaning of it?

Secretary LANSING. So far as the commission of inquiry is concerned, I should say yes.

Senator McCUMBER. And this commission can veto the action of the Government in sending the delegate whom it sends if it sees fit?

The CHAIRMAN. Does that apply to Government delegates or only the other two?

Secretary LANSING. It relates entirely to a commission of inquiry, and all that is agreed is that each of the members agrees to nominate within six months of the date on which the present treaty comes into force three persons of industrial experience, of whom one shall be a representative of employers, one a representative worker, and one a person of independent standing, who shall together form a panel from which the members of the commission of inquiry shall be drawn.

Senator McCUMBER. Yes. Do you not think in a case of that kind that the Government should have a right to determine whom it should send, and that that representative should not be subject to repudiation by this general governing body? Is not that putting the Government in a rather abject position?

Secretary LANSING. Well, I am not sure. I do not know. As I say, I am not familiar with this question; I would have to think this over before answering your question.

Mr. President, I have thought it over, and my conclusion is that this power to revise and reject credentials is absolutely conferred upon the general conference in the matter of delegates to that conference and upon the governing body in the matter of selections to the panel from which the commission of inquiry is to be drawn.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know whether or not the Senator has requested not to be interrupted.

Mr. THOMAS. I have not so requested. I would, of course, prefer that I should answer questions at the close of my remarks, but I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will accede to the Senator's desire not to be interrupted, if he wishes, because he is reading from manuscript.

Mr. THOMAS. No.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am called from the floor, and that is my only excuse for inquiring now.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is fortunate. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is with great regret that I shall have to absent myself. I shall return as soon as possible.

In relation to what the Senator has called "Government delegates," or delegates appointed by the various Governments to this conference, has the Senator an accurate idea or opinion as to whether the action of these delegates appointed by the Governments of the various nations members of the league is to have any binding effect or influence upon governmental action in relation to the several matters considered by the conference?

Mr. THOMAS. An influence undoubtedly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They represent officially the Government as such?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; but I shall later call attention to the fact that the article as it stands was finally accepted upon the theory that the delegates representing the employees would in all probability exercise a greater control upon the action of the Government delegates than the degelates representing the employers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator has called attention to this proposal, which, if carried into effect, would permit this governing body to reject the delegates appointed by the Government of the United States. Is not that proposal in line with that provision of the special treaty with France which provides that the treaty, when ratified by the Senate, shall then be submitted to the executive council of the league for approval or disapproval?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; although the one is a covenant under which nations as equals shall determine a subject, while the other is a delegation of authority to a conference or convention of men to pass upon the commissions of officials holding them from the Government of the United States among others.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But both proposals involve the creation of a supergovernment?

Mr. THOMAS. Well, that calls for a categorical reply, which I do not care at present to make. [Reading:]

Senator McCUMBER. Then let us take article 414 again: Do you understand this to mean that this governing body, after listening to the report of the commission, may determine that a boycott should be levied against the United States, if it failed to put its laborers, for instance, upon the same basis as the laborers of Germany or Great Britain or of Norway or of Sweden, or of any other country?

Secretary LANSING. Of course, it does not say any such thing. All it says is they are to report.

Senator McCUMBER. No; but it says further that they may report the measures, if any, of an economic character against a defaulting Government which it considers to be appropriate, and which it considers other Governments would be justified in adopting. Of course, they only report.

Secretary LANSING. That is all.

Senator McCUMBER. But do you think it an appropriate thing for a great Government to put itself in a position in which it should subject itself in honor or in any other way to be hauled up before a commission of this kind to answer as to what it should do with reference to its own labor?

Secretary LANSING. I do not think there is anything out of the way about that at all.

This innovation upon preestablished international rights and dignities may be essential to the purposes of part 13 of the treaty, but it is nevertheless a surprising one. Personally I do not like a covenant which subjects the selection of high officials by the Government of the United States for the discharge of important international functions to review and possible rejection by an external authority. Its adverse exercise would be an affront to the representative and a reflection upon the good faith and dignity of the Republic. It would be quite as appropriate and quite as necessary to endow the executive council, or the assembly of the league, with similar authority over its membership.

Without further and satisfactory information regarding the need for this extraordinary provision, I doubt the wisdom of making it a precedent by giving it sanction of our approval. Its exercise would breed resentments, culminating in friction and possible rupture.

Article 390 provides that if in accordance with the previous article the conference refuses admission to a delegation of one of the members, its provisions shall apply as if that delegate had not been nominated. This clearly means that the conference and not the appointing Government will seat or exclude the delegate as it may determine. The treaty thus makes the conference a substitute for or a supplement to the President and the Senate, as to all Executive appointments to the general conference, and to panels for commissions of inquiry.

By the terms of article 393 the international labor office is placed under the control of a governing body consisting of 24 persons, of whom 12 shall represent the Governments, 6 shall be selected by the delegates to the conference representing the employers, and 6 representing the employees. Their terms of office are limited to three years. Article 394 authorizes the governing body to appoint a director of the international labor office, who shall be subject to its instructions and responsible for the efficient conduct of the office.

Eight of the twelve members of the Government delegates shall be nominated by the members which the council of the league of nations shall decide to be of chief industrial importance and the remaining four by the members selected therefor by the Government delegates to the conference, who are themselves excluded from their selection.

The official introduction to the labor program informs the public that much controversy developed in the commission over these articles, the contention being that "each party" should have equal voting power in the governing body. But the plan was finally accepted, among other reasons, because "it was likely, especially in the future, that the Government delegates would vote more often with the workers than against them. If this were so, it was obviously to the advantage of the latter that the Governments should have two votes instead of one, as it would render it easier for them to obtain a two-thirds majority," and so forth.

This admirably frank disclosure clearly indicates that labor expects and intends to influence or direct the selection of the governing body, to the end that they shall be in fact employees' delegates. We should not be surprised at this, nor should we too severely condemn it, for the facts could not be otherwise. No doubt the employers will be equally active in the other direction. Control of the governing body by controlling the Government delegates to the conference will therefore be a vital political element in the domestic discords, and policies of the appointing members and the selections will be made to accord with the interests of the victors at their polls.

We thus encounter the inevitable human equation, actively operating even among "high contracting parties moved by sentiments of justice and humanity." Within half a score of years after the adoption of this treaty the governing body of the international labor league will be as distinctively partisan as the body now honoring me with its attention. We shall either add to the tribunals created by man in his eternal gropings for millennial conditions or impose some of our distracting and insoluble problems upon another and a greater forum.

The functions of the international labor office are specific and general. Those specified are obviously desirable; those to be assigned it can not be classified, although some of them can be foreseen.

By article 399 each member is required to pay the traveling expenses and subsistence of its delegates and their advisers; also of its representatives attending meetings of the conference or governing body. All other expenses of the international labor office, whose staff shall be appointed by the director, and of these meetings shall be paid out of the general funds of the league. This prompts an inquiry as to cost, which thus far has been subordinated to more exciting but no more important considerations. The taxpayer has not up to this time been consulted; yet these subjects possess something more than passing interest for him.

We can not forecast the expense which the two establishments—that of the league proper and that of the labor office—will entail upon him, but it will be something, even in these wildly extravagant times, when a billion is shaken from the national plum tree every month and the multitude is clamoring for as much again. But "every little makes a mickle," as the old Scotch proverb runs, and it is quite conceivable that establishments dealing in world affairs, political and economic, will require tens of thousands of employees, distributed among many departments, bureaus, and commissions. These will organize, of course, and they must be paid; otherwise they will surely disturb the peace of the world. Our proportion must be forthcoming. We can not know in advance, but we may conjecture what it is to be.

I know it is said that as the league will make armaments unnecessary, save for purely defensive purposes, our post-league expenditures will decrease instead of expanding. I fervently pray that it may be so, and while I am in public life I shall vote, as I have always voted in times of peace, for modest military and naval appropriations. Thus far this vote has been of little avail. But we can not in any event show a balance to the profit side of the national ledger if we are to give billions to our returning soldiers and continue expending millions in river improvements, public buildings, transportation, reclamation, artificial harbors, influenza, cholera infantum, wolves, prairie dogs, beetles, boll weevils, and congressional investigations. Moreover, while the public may regard appropriations for internal expenditure with comparative unconcern, they may not be so passive as to those devoted to subjects of external concern. Hamilton said:

> There is perhaps nothing more likely to disturb the tranquillity of nations than their being bound to mutual contributions for a common object that does not yield an equal and coincident benefit, for it is an observation as true as it is trite that there is nothing men differ so readily about as the payment of money.

I perceive nothing the International Labor League could recommend that would by any possibility "yield an equal and coincident benefit" to the United States, where labor conditions are generally superior to those of any other class. And this is comparatively true of Great Britain, her colonies, and France, which are precisely the nations upon whom will fall the chief financial burden of supporting the permanent organization. I am now considering a very sordid but nevertheless a very essential element of the equation. It may be unworthy of notice. I may only betray the viewpoint of a mighty problem, discreditable to it and unworthy of myself. Yet the whole structure of the league requires financial support for its operation, as do all the plans of man, whether material, economic, social, political, or religious. And it is of special importance here, because all the nations of the league are to be assessed for the benefit of a class whose organized units among the principal nations possess treasuries free from taxation and overflowing with abundance. Continued and incessant inquiry concerning and the institution of world-wide covenants for changes in labor conditions will impose enormous burdens upon the revenues of the league, which must derive its funds from the contributions of its member nations. And it may be well in passing to add that article 25 of the treaty empowers the executive council of the league to "include as part of the expenses of the secretariat the expenses of any bureau or commission which is placed under the direction of the league." These must multiply as time advances, and it is well to consider them now lest future budgets comprise other fiscal affairs larger than our own. Taxation is even now so near the limit of endurance that those bearing the burden are prone to extend Sherman's famous aphorism on war to times of peace.

Chapter 2 of part 13 deals with procedure. I shall comment only upon its most important features, beginning with article 405, which consists of 11 paragraphs. This article provides that when the conference has decided on the adoption of proposals of an item in the agenda, it shall determine whether they shall take the form of a recommendation to the members to give it effect by national legislation or otherwise, or of a draft international convention for ratification by them; but in either case a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present shall be necessary on the final vote for the adoption of either by the conference.

I digress here for a moment to refer to article 407, which radically modifies this requirement by providing that "if any convention coming before the conference for final consideration fails to secure the support of two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present, it shall nevertheless be within the right of the members of the permanent organization to agree to such convention among themselves." This enables two or more members to agree upon and ratify a covenant, which as to themselves becomes operative. It may be in radical collision with other recommendations and covenants operative elsewhere, which must threaten strife and contention culminating in disputes, covered by articles 13 and 15 of part 1, or something graver. And it would very naturally encourage the proponents of such a covenant to urge its adoption by other members in the interest of peace, which might for that reason entertain it, however undesirable, as a rule of local economic operation. But its principal effect is to virtually destroy the force of the two-thirds rule provided in article 405. Returning to that article, it is provided that in framing a recommendation or draft convention of general application the conference shall have due regard to countries wherein climatic conditions, imperfect development of industrial organization, or other special circumstances make industrial conditions substantially different, and shall suggest appropriate modifications. A copy of the recommendation or draft convention, authenticated by the president of the conference and the director, shall be deposited with the secretary general of the league of nations, who will communicate a certified copy thereof to each of the members, and these undertake within one year from the closing of the session of the conference, and in any event within 18 months thereafter, to bring the subject "before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action." In the case of a recommendation the members will inform the secretary general of the action taken. In the case of a draft convention the member will, if it is lawfully ratified, communicate the fact to the secretary general, and will take necessary action to make the convention effective. If no legislative or other action on recommendation is taken to make a recommendation effective, or if the draft convention is not ratified, "no further obligation shall rest upon the member."

The next provision of this article applies peculiarly to the United States. I therefore quote it verbatim:

In the case of a federal State, the power of which to enter into conventions on labor matters is subject to limitations, it shall be in the discretion of that government to treat a draft convention to which such limitations apply as a recommendation only, and the provisions of this article with respect to recommendations shall apply in such case.

I need hardly remind my colleagues that our power to enter into conventions on labor matters is subject to all those limitations which inhere to the States of the Union. These have reserved to themselves such subjects of domestic concern. Their jurisdiction, save as modified by the commerce and emigration clauses of the Constitution, is practically absolute. In acknowledgment of this condition, the clause just quoted was inserted into the article.

The official report recites that—the American delegation pointed out that the Federal Government could not accept the obligation to ratify conventions dealing with matters within the competence of the 48 States of the Union, with which the power of labor legislation for the most part rested. Further, the Federal Government could not guarantee that the constituent States, even if they passed the necessary legislation to give effect to a convention, would put it into effective operation, nor could it provide against the possibility of such legislation being declared unconstitutional by the supreme judicial authorities. The Government could not therefore engage to do something which it was not within its power to perform, and the nonperformance of which would render them liable to complaint.

The paragraph quoted from section 405 was devised to meet this situation. I shall discuss it later in connection with subsequent articles of the chapter, for it is of unusual importance to this country. But it is well here to emphasize the fact that for the reasons assigned by the report from which I have just quoted the United States must in many cases treat a proposed draft convention of the general conference as a recommendation and make it effective, if possible, by Federal and State legislation, principally the latter.

The last paragraph of the article provides that no member shall be asked or required, as a result of adopting any recommendation or draft convention, "to lessen the protection afforded by its existing legislation to the workers concerned." Compliance with this provision may be desirable, but it is difficult to reconcile it with the avowed object of establishing uniformity in labor conditions without shaping recommendations and covenants to the most advanced and liberal "existing legislation."

For some time I entertained a doubt whether article 405 did not invest the conference with a species of legislative or treaty-making power. This was due in some degree to press reports of the debates in the labor commission over its original provisions. But I am convinced, upon more mature reflection, that it does not. It vests the conference with power only to set the machinery in motion by adopting proposals to be submitted to members which may or may not accept them. But proposals for the extension of this power will probably soon follow the establishment of the permanent organization, if I correctly apprehend the purport of this extract from the official introduction.

The original draft of article 405 proposed that any draft convention adopted by the conference by a two-thirds majority must be ratified by every State participating unless within one year the national legislature should have expressed its disapproval of the draft convention. This implied an obligation on every State to submit any draft convention approved by the conference to its national legislature within one year, whether its own Government representatives had voted in favor of its adoption or not. This provision was inspired by the belief that although the time had not yet come when anything in the nature of an international legislature whose decisions should be binding on the different States was possible, yet it was essential for the progress of international labor legislation to require the Governments to give their national legislatures the opportunity of expressing their opinion on the measures favored by a two-thirds majority of the labor conference. The French and Italian delegations, on the other hand, desired that States should be under an obligation to ratify conventions so adopted whether their legislative authorities approved them or not, subject to a right of appeal to the executive council of the league of nations. The council might invite the conference to reconsider its decision, and in the event of its being reaffirmed there would be no further right of appeal. Other delegates, though not unsympathetic to the hope expressed in the first resolution printed at the end of the draft convention, that in course of time the labor conference might, through the growth of a spirit of internationality, acquire the powers of a truly legislative international assembly, felt that the time for such a development was not ripe. If an attempt were made at this stage to deprive States of a large measure of their sovereignty in regard to labor legislation, the result would be that a considerable number of States would either refuse to accept the present convention altogether or, if they accepted it, would subsequently denounce it, and might even prefer to resign their membership in the league of nations rather than jeopardize their national economic position by being obliged to carry out the decisions of the international labor conference. The majority of the commission therefore decided in favor of making ratifications of a convention subject to the approval of the national legislatures or other competent authorities.

Does not this indicate that the article is regarded by its authors as too restricted, and that its early advance to the dignity of an international legislative character is clearly comprehended? And when made will the proposal be rejected by nations whose governing authorities, anxious for the retention of political power, and whose opposing statesmen, equally anxious to succeed them, are in competition for a majority of the electorate? The answer is in the lap of time. But one may conjecture that the French and Italian delegates will change neither their views nor their purposes, which are doubtless shared by many of their fellow delegates from the other countries.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. With pleasure.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Following the line suggested just at that point, does the Senator know that the German Socialists who were in control of Germany, or of one of the revolutions in Germany, objected to the labor-draft article in the covenant of the league of nations because the council that was set up had no legislative authority to enact labor legislation for the separate Governments of the world? That being the case, as I recall it was the case, the sentiment in Germany as expressed by the rulers of Germany at that time would seem to have been in line with the sentiment of the French and Italian delegates as expressed in the conference.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not recall it, but I have no doubt it is a fact. Not only is Germany so disposed, but it is the assumption in many countries, regarding this feature of the league, that it is the beginning of a plan leading to the final establishment of an international legislature whose statute or convention, or whatever it may be called, will eo ipso be binding upon the constituents of the assembly.

I do not look for the early advent of the stupendous upheaval which must come to the structure of American Government before it could constitutionally assent to such a delegation of power, but I can well imagine how efforts to secure it would profoundly disturb our domestic peace, for the labor program points that way.

Article 408 requires each member to make annual report to the labor office of the measures it has taken to give effect to the provisions of conventions to which it is a party. The word "convention," as here and subsequently used in part 13, seems designed to include the recommendations provided for in article 405. Otherwise this and succeeding sections would not fully cover the subject matter with which they deal, since the conference may act both by proposing recommendations or draft conventions, the former being more adaptable to the structure of a federated republic.

A convention is defined in civil law to be "the agreement of several persons, who by a common act of the will determine their legal relations for the purpose either of creating an obligation or of extinguishing one." It is elsewhere defined as "an agreement between parties." It may therefore comprehend the two forms to either of which the labor conference may resort for making the items of its agend operative. Moreover the official introduction accompanying the delivery of the program to the peace congress, in discussing chapter 2, says: "These articles provide machinery whereby a State which fails to carry out its obligations arising under article 19 or which fails to enforce a convention which it has ratified," and so forth. The word "obligations" is broad enough to include every covenant provided for by article 19, which is article 405 of the treaty.

But conventions, like recommendations, are seldom self-executing. Hence legislation is required to make each effectual, and these are the "measures" to be taken and which must be annually reported to the international labor office. Complaints, therefore, against a member that it is not securing the effective observance of a convention which it has ratified must rest either upon the absence of legislation, upon incomplete legislation, or upon the nonenforcement of legislation "to give effect to the provisions of such covenants." The pertinence of my comments upon this chapter should not therefore require any strained interpretations of the term "convention."

Articles 409 and 410 require careful examination. They provide that—

In the event of any representation being made to the international labor office by an industrial association of employers or of workers that any of the members has failed to secure in any respect the effective observance within its jurisdiction of any convention to which it is a party, the governing body may communicate this representation to the government against which it is made and may invite that government to make such statement on the subject as it may think fit.

By article 410 it is provided that if no statement is received from such Government within a reasonable time, or when received is not satisfactory to the governing body, the latter shall have the right to publish the representation and the reply to it, if any.

It is quite apparent that section 409 gives unrestricted permission to industrial associations of employers or workmen, whether within or without the territorial jurisdiction of any member, to make this representation concerning it. The right, broad as it would then be, is not restricted to nationalities. The Calkers' Union of San Francisco or a union of employers of that city may complain of the United States or it may charge Great Britain or Japan with failure to observe their covenants. And an association of employers or workers in Milan may similarly cite its own Government or the Republic of France to the bar of the governing body. What one association may do, all associations may do; and it is inevitable that whenever an association feels itself aggrieved at the manner its own or any other Government is observing a labor covenant or that its observance does not comply with that association's judgment as to the character or method of such observance, it will file its representation and demand action. It must also be remembered that the I. W. W. calls itself an association of workers. The opportunities here presented to such an organization for annoying and bedeviling the members of the league and the governing body as well are many and continuous, and we may be sure that full advantage will be taken of them. It is true that the governing body has no power to discipline a member failing to respond or respond satisfactorily beyond publishing the particulars of the incident, but we have, nevertheless, the statement of the official report that—these articles (with succeeding ones) provide machinery whereby its obligations arising under article 19 (405), or which fails to enforce a convention which it has ratified, may be subject to economic measures.

I quote further from the official report:

This machinery is briefly as follows: An industrial association of employers and (or) workpeople may make representations to the industrial labor office, which the governing body may at its discretion communicate to the State complained of for its observations. If no satisfactory reply is received, the governing body may publish the correspondence, which in most cases will probably create sufficient pressure by public opinion to cause the complaint to be remedied.

The report then proceeds with an elucidation of succeeding articles regarding enforcement.

The spectacle of the United States of America cited to the bar of the governing body of the international labor office of the league of nations by an association of employers or of employees and invited to make a statement satisfactory to it or be "subject to the pressure of public opinion," not once or twice but continually, would be unthinkable did we not find warrant for it in these articles. The prospect of it is apparent. Can the most ardent advocate of the treaty contemplate it with complacency or accept it as an essential to the establishment of an enduring peace?

Article 411 confers upon every member the right to file a complaint against any other member with the international labor office if not satisfied that such other member is securing the effective observance of any convention which both have ratified in accordance with foregoing articles. The governing body may, in its discretion, communicate with the member complained of as provided in article 409, or it may apply for the appointment of a commission of inquiry to consider the complaint and to report thereon. And it may adopt this procedure of its own motion or on receipt of a complaint from any delegate to the conference. As stated in the official report:

The governing body also has the power, either on its own motion or on receipt of a complaint from a Government or from a delegate to the conference, to apply to the secretary general of the league of nations to nominate a commission of inquiry.

This subjects every member of the league to a commission of inquiry whenever any delegate to the conference, however insignificant the State he represents or however limited his vision or experience, or whatever his motive, may see fit to file a complaint against it. We may be very sure that if the representation of an association of employers under section 409 should come to naught it would soon crystallize in the form of a complaint by the governing body or some delegate to the conference.

Provision is also made by this article for representation in behalf of the member complained of while the complaint is under consideration. This is an obviously essential requirement which would doubtless be supplied by implication. For the accused, albeit a great nation, is entitled to a day in court under any system for the administration of justice worthy of the name.

It is of interest to inquire whether the governing body in preferring charges against a member will act by a majority or as a unit. Part 13 gives us no information as to the manner in which this somewhat important function is to be exercised. It is fair to presume that, in the absence of an express provision to the contrary, majorities govern the proceedings of all deliberative or governing bodies. This is true in Great Britain and America, and is the only method consistent with the due transaction of business. It must follow, then, that every State will be subject to the action of the governing body as reflected in the expressed judgment of 12 of its members, since the State complained of may not, and obviously should not, be allowed to vote in its own behalf. Of course, the governing body can, under article 393, regulate its own procedure, and may devise some other and fairer method of making complaint against members of the league. But it is paradoxical that a board created by these members for the effective organization of the international labor office should be clothed with authority to hale its creators into court and put them upon trial when and as it may determine.

It is provided by articles 417 and 418 that upon the application of the governing body the secretary general of the league of nations shall nominate three persons from those of the panel which shall have survived the scrutiny of the governing board, one from each of its three sections, which shall constitute the commission of inquiry to consider the complaint and prepare a report of its findings and recommendations and an indication of the measures if any of an economic character which it considers appropriate against a defaulting government and which it considers other governments would be justified in adopting. This is the diplomatic method of creating an international judicial tribunal and clothing it with authority to hear causes and pronounce judgment upon them.

The secretary general of the league shall communicate the report of the commission of inquiry to each Government concerned in the complaint, which shall within one month inform him whether or not it accepts the recommendations of the commission; and if not, whether it proposes to appeal to the permanent court of international justice of the league of nations. These articles are silent as to any judgment of acquittal which the commission of inquiry might return. It is therefore fair to assume that with such an outcome there will be an end to the controversy.

The permanent court upon the appeal may affirm, vary, or reverse any of the findings or recommendations of the court of inquiry, and shall also indicate the measures of an economic character it considers appropriate, and which other Governments would be justified in adopting against a defaulting Government, and its decision "shall be final."

The finality thus placed upon the controversy would seem to preclude its submission to the league of nations under the provisions of articles 11, 12, 13, and 15, although it might be one threatening to disturb international peace and likely to lead to rupture. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius is a maxim of construction applicable alike to statutes and treaties. It is equally true of each that their parts shall be construed together that effect may be given to the whole. I am aware that part 1, article 14, authorizes the creation of the permanent court, competent to determine any dispute of an international character which the parties thereto submit to it. But these disputes arising under the operation of part 13 may not originate between members of the league, although they may well disturb international peace. They may originate between a member and an industrial association, or a member and the governing body, or a member and a delegate to the conference. We may have power to legislate this contemplated authority by treaty, but the question is more than one of expediency and the discrimination is obvious.

Article 419 authorizes any member of the league to take against any member failing within the specified time to comply with the terms of the decision of the commission or of the permanent court—the measures of an economic character indicated in the report of the commission or of the court as appropriate to the case.

Here, too, the procedure for compelling obedience to the ultimate decision seems to clash with that appropriate to controversies arising under part 1 of the league. Thus under article 16 resort to war by a member in disregard of its covenants shall ipso facto be deemed an act of war against all the other members which undertake to act in concert against it by the application of an economic boycott. The council will in such case recommend what effective military, naval, and air force the members shall severally contribute for the coercion of the offender.

But a member which ignores, or partly performs, or is tardy in performing the judgment of the commission of inquiry, or the permanent court, under the provisions of part 13, subjects itself to the economic discipline of any other member of the league which may determine to act, whatever its motive, and without regard to the attitude of other members. The defaulting member has not "resorted to war." Its offense is purely one of omission. Other members may be wholly disinclined to interfere. They may indeed be in sympathy with or justify the defaulting member. If the council of the league interferes at all in such a case it must be to sustain the policy of the member enforcing the penalty by levying the execution.

Such conditions are inevitable under the operation of these articles, if I properly comprehend them. One country finding the requirements of its covenants burdensome and unprofitable will surely be lax in observing them. Another country, prospering under their operation, will insist upon their continued and "effective observance" on the part of all by invoking the machinery of the permanent organization, and, the decision being secured, will mobilize its economic resources for its due enforcement. Nations in sympathy with the defaulter will at least remain quiescent. The situation must culminate in a crisis that may involve all members of the league. Class legislation is deplorable in domestic jurisdictions. It will prove intolerable when it becomes international.

But as regards America, an interesting constitutional question comes here to its relief, for it is now conceded that our broad treaty-making power can not transgress nor supersede the limitations of our organic charter. I have heretofore referred to that provision of article 405 which, applying to Governments like ours, in some instances will convert proposed draft conventions or treaty propositions into recommendations, and also that both recommendations and conventions must be made effective by legislation, which in many cases must be enacted by the States and in others by the Congress. In either case the legislation is local, and to be valid it must conform to organic requirements. Its validity and operation are questions which none but the judicial authority of the States and the Nation can determine. That authority is not subject to delegation, and certainly not to a foreign or international tribunal. No sovereign can permit any but its own authority to construe and enforce its laws, much less to require the enactment of specific ones.

Sovereignty abdicates the instant it transfers or shares this power. Differences over the meaning of treaty covenants may be submitted to outside arbitration, provided the difference be not a question of constitutional authority to make them, but statutes never. I am somewhat reluctant in these days of liberal and loose construction to express unqualified opinions upon questions of constitutional authority unless I feel very sure of my ground, for the courts have often reminded me, by a process of deduction, that my legal training and experience had taught me nothing. Yet I can not avoid the conclusion that articles 405 to 420, inclusive, of part 13 of the treaty, assume to vest international commissions of inquiry and the permanent court of international justice with jurisdiction of disputes involving the construction, sufficiency, and enforcement of Federal and State legislation enacted for the effectual operation of conventions, and recommendations proposed by the labor conference and accepted by the United States as a member of the league of nations. If this view is the sound one and my construction of these articles is sound, we have no power to ratify these articles; and if we did, our action would in the end prove but an idle ceremony.

I have not overlooked article 423, which provides that any dispute relating to this part of the present treaty, or any subsequent convention concluded by the members in pursuance of its provisions, shall be referred for decision to the permanent court of international justice. Here again is a most important feature designed to make part 13, although an integral portion of the treaty, a law unto itself. But unless the subsequent conventions which it includes are confined to amendatory covenants to part 13, to be adopted under the provisions of article 422, it only serves to emphasize my contention.

Otherwise article 423 would neutralize those portions of sections 411 to 419 creating the commission of inquiry and endowing it with authority to entertain and adjudicate complaints relating to conventions evolved from the operation of article 405. These are not to be "referred for decision to the permanent court"; they need not go there at all, and if they go, the procedure is then one of appeal from the decision of the commission of inquiry.

It will be observed that amendments to part 13 are to be made as required by the terms of article 422. They must be adopted by the conference by a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present, and then ratified by the States whose representatives compose the council of the league, and by three-fourths of the members. The so-called draft conventions come into being in pursuance of rather than as a part of the treaty, and article 406 expressly declares that such conventions shall bind only the members which ratify it.

It may be contended that the provisions of articles 405 to 420 relate to the enforcement and not to the interpretation of covenants. Such may have been the intention of the framers of part 13, but the common experience of every lawyer in the land teaches him that enforcement frequently involves, and therefore includes, interpretation.

Under these articles it involves a consideration of the structure and sufficiency of the measures enacted by the member government whenever the efficient observance by that government of its conventions shall be challenged. And it would be remarkable if it does not involve a construction of the convention as well.

Any item of the October agenda of the labor conference will serve to illustrate this contention. Take, for example, the question of preventing or providing against unemployment. I can not say what recommendation or draft convention may be proposed for the solution of this difficulty. But no man can conceive of any plan the operation of which will not require extensive domestic legislation everywhere, and particularly in democratic countries, with great numbers of officials to make them effective. These, however elaborate, can not function with uniform success. Complaints innumerable will flow from industrial associations, and conference delegates to the governing body and commissions of inquiry will increase and multiply. How can these tribunals hear and dispose of them, or recommend changes, or suggest methods of economic discipline, without examining and passing judgment upon the measures, the legislation, and the processes of the defaulting member? You might as well expect a physician to treat a malignant disease without acquainting himself with its causes and with the bodily condition of the patient.

And we must not forget that measures of an economic character to be prescribed and enforced against a defaulting member can be made effective only by a boycott from without and a strike within its territory. Both will be invoked and applied wherever a defendant State declines to accept the verdict of the final decree. Between the upper and nether millstones of these tremendous and cooperating pressures no nation, however powerful and independent, can successfully defend its right to make its own laws and live its own life without an appeal to the sword. I fear that the President's lofty and eloquent indorsement of this scheme for stabilizing conditions of labor throughout the world, and ultimately relieving the unhappy conditions prevailing in too many places, was not preceded by a dispassionate and exhaustive analysis of the program.

Of the high and human sentiments entertained by the labor congress I make no question. Of the need for improvement in the affairs of labor in many parts of the world I make no doubt. But these ends can not be effected overnight by covenants, nor the processes of its evolution upward by pressure from one direction. Mankind is better off to-day than it was half a century ago; far better then than half a century earlier. And the organized wage earners in all democracies, notably with us, do not confront conditions "involving such injustice, hardship, and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great as to imperil the harmony of the world," unless we apply the effect of such conditions to the remaining elements of society, for organized labor since its feeble beginnings of 50 years ago has waxed in numbers and in power. It has advanced from one victory to another, until to-day it holds the scales of authority. It dictates to legislatures and shapes the policies of administrations. It has demanded and obtained immunity from the processes of the courts, has been exempted from the penal and restrictive statutes against monopolies and combinations, identifies itself with every general scheme of legislation, fixes its own wage scales and hours of employment, and has become arrogantly indifferent to the rights of the unorganized and long-suffering public. It is now demanding a compensation for service in transportation, out of all proportion to its ability to pay, for ostensible relief from economic conditions it has largely but unconsciously aided in creating. It admits that the increases if granted will not relieve but surely aggravate the evil in whose name the demand is made. It knows the added sum must come from the depleted hoards of the overburdened taxpayer, but it answers by threatening to add to his miseries by paralyzing the whole system of transportation if the authorities are not prompt in responding to these requirements.

Less than a week ago 14,000 men paralyzed for two days the transportation system of 5,000,000 of people in the city of New York, which they had built at enormous cost and whose operation is indispensable to their daily activities. But their necessities were unheeded, their rights disregarded, their property rendered worthless, until the levy of tribute to the union was complied with.

All over the country, in every department of industry, these conditions prevail, albeit wages, salaries, and nearly every form of income to labor have reached undreamed of levels; and honest men who would relieve these conditions, who believe that in free America one may work or idle as he will without becoming a unit in some great association, is denied that right and assaulted and beaten to death if he dares presume to exercise it. The closed shop is becoming organized labor's battle cry, and absolute domination of the industrial and political world its openly avowed objective. Unrest there is here in abundance, which imperils our peace and harmony. It is not due to labor conditions but because of them. They are tyrannous, unjust, and opposed to the fundamentals of American freedom.

Not the least sinister aspect of this grave situation is the contagion of unionism. It long ago absorbed Government employees. It is now active among gravediggers, actors, physicians, titled ladies in waiting, pupils, and policemen. The Association of Federal Employees announce a general convention for next month, when they will deliberate upon their own interests, agree upon a program of mutual demands, and then instruct the Congress what to do. The police of some of our great cities have organized and affiliated with the American Federation, and are preparing to do so in others. These officials are charged with the duty of enforcing obedience to the laws, apprehending offenders against them, protecting society from outlaws and marauders, preserving the peace, and maintaining order, for which they are compensated from the public revenues. They are assuming an attitude and propose to give an allegiance which sooner or later must come into collision with the performance of duties imposed upon them by law, and which are vital to the life of the social order. Here is a hyphenated loyalty far more corroding to the moral fiber of a citizen and an officer than any or all those we encountered before and during the war with Germany. For the union policeman confronts two codes of action, one directed by the law whose officer he is, and the other by the Federation whose authority he has accepted. The dire consequences threatened by this situation are reflected in the recent experiences of Winnipeg and Liverpool, where the guardians of the law ignored their duties, threw away their clubs, and passively cooperated with the unrestrained forces of pillage and disorder. Riot raged unrestricted, thieves plied their trade unmolested, the citizen was assaulted and plundered in the streets, shops were looted with leisurely impunity, women and children were not immune to plunder and outrage within their own homes, the citizen was compelled by the eternal law of self-preservation to abandon his own affairs, perform police duty on his own account, and finally the army was utilized to man the simple machinery of municipal government that the public might be saved from the wolves with which their watchdogs had become identified.

During the recent strike of street car employees in Cleveland the strikers stoned the occupants and demolished moving cars with rank impunity. They were filled with passengers having the right to use them, and manned by motormen and conductors having the right to operate them. I am credibly informed that these outrages were committed in the presence of union policemen, whose official eyes saw them but whose unionized hands were not raised in interference. They walked their beats, looked straight ahead, let the strikers work their will, and doubtless drew their regular pay from the city treasury. What sort of civic spirit or public opinion prevails in America that these things can be and pass unrebuked and unopposed? Is political support, however badly needed, to be purchased at the price of an acquiescence which means approval? Do not these conditions invite the criminal elements of society to prey upon it at their will whenever industrial disturbances occur to suspend the arm of civil authority? What is the end to be?

Justice to organizations of men requires the acknowledgment that they are imitations of organizations of capital, and were originally designed for protection against them. It was not the worker but the employer who started the Nation upon this descent toward Avernus. Combinations of industry, of transportation, of capital, preceded and accelerated combinations of men. These, with their fictitious capitalization and their constant march toward monopoly, are and have been quite as dangerous to our well-being and our institutions. They have sinned as recklessly as the workers, fully as unmindful of public needs, of individual right, of the restraints of law, of the rights of producer and consumer. They, too, have controlled Congresses and legislatures, dictated administrative policies, and selected judges for the bench. Labor may well say to capital, "The villainy you teach me I will execute. And it will go hard, but I will better the instruction." The promoters of these huge combinations are largely responsible for our present prevailing evils. They may not be able to retrace their steps, but they can change their direction. During the past 40 years, I have, with others, consistently warned my countrymen of the certain consequences of unchecked and unhindered industrial and financial combinations, but my voice and the voices of others have fallen upon unlistening ears. These have pursued their arrogant way, indifferent alike to public opinion and to the Nemesis which sooner or later must overtake them.

Now that the balance of power has shifted, and rests with organizations of men, which follow the same practices, utilize the same methods, aspire to the same ends, and threaten the same consequences, we must recognize the same perils and sound the same warnings. It is the danger and not the source of it with which we must concern ourselves, for if our political and social existence be menaced, if our institutions are to be altered or undermined, it is unimportant whether the destructive force be exerted by external violence or internal organism. The fate of nations is not more determined by their wars than by the distintegrating processes of internal elements charged with hate, ambition, and class contentions, to which a torpid public spirit becomes indifferent. Shall a timid Congress at such a crisis imitate a craven press which flippantly recites the multiplying instances of a national disorder while diverting attention to more commonplace affairs? Or shall we strive to arouse a true American sentiment to the responsibilities of citizenship and the instant need for their assumption?

Let us not forget that the French were driven to revolution by the combined oppressions of the nobility and the guilds, that they smote both to the earth, and banished both by the decrees of their immortal constitution. Here are conditions which part 13 of the treaty neither provides against nor catalogues among those requiring correction by international covenants.

You ask what can be done. I recognize the difficulty of making adequate reply. But since these conditions are the offspring of competing organized forces, we should certainly organize nonpartisan America for the preservation of the Union. A large majority of our wage earners are as good and loyal citizens as you and I. They deplore prevailing conditions as we do. They ring true to every test when their country calls. They are in the grip of an all-powerful system, and do its will and obey its decrees because they must. Ninety per cent of the employers are Americans also, and I use the word in no restricted sense. They love their country and perceive its needs. They, too, are in the grip of a system, equally conscienceless, equally exacting. Let Americans forget partisanship, forget sectional interest, forget class, and rededicate themselves to America. I include every man without regard to race, religion, or nativity whose first heartbeats are for the Nation, for the right of every man to live and work out his own lawful ends in his own way, freed from the tyranny and exactions of self-created overlords, for the continued union of liberty with laws recognizing and preserving the privileges of each, for the welfare of the vast public mass which are the producers, the consumers, the taxpayers, the defenders, and the final hope of the Republic; that mass upon which falls the huge burden of riot, of insurrection, and the manifold evils and oppressions of a society struggling against and torn asunder by fierce and insatiable demands of a small but well-disciplined section of itself. Unite everywhere, and the centers formed will be rallying points for every man of action. This seems to me imperative. You can not confront regulars with raw militia. What are cornstalks to cannon, or the vagrant winds of the sea to the magic power of steam?

Let us give to capital and to labor each its own, and to all our people the equal protection of the laws. This is a mighty task, but not too great for America, and we must bequeath the heritage of our fathers unimpaired to our children.

Mr. President, I have faith in the institutions of my country. I sometimes picture this great Republic as a majestic image, towering to the clouds from an eternal anchorage of justice and ordered liberty, its benignant features bathed in the eternal sunlight of heaven, its invincible arms extended above our continent-covering domain, shielding, protecting, encouraging. May such an image find sanctuary in the hearts of every man and woman and child under the national ensign, quickening their affection, stimulating their patriotism, and ministering to their sense of civic responsibility. No nation can perish whose people are thus inspired.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. KENYON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Elkins	Henderson	Lodge
Bankhead	Fall	Hitchcock	McCumber
Brandegee	Gay	Johnson, S. Dak.	McKellar
Calder	Gronna	Kenyon	McNary
Capper	Hale	King	Nelson
Colt	Harding	La Follette	Norris
Curtis	Harris	Lenroot	Nugent

Page	Sheppard	Sutherland	Walsh, Mont.
Phelan	Smith, Ariz.	Swanson	Warren
Phipps	Smith, Md.	Townsend	Watson
Ransdell	Smoot	Trammell	Wolcott
Reed	Spencer	Wadsworth
Robinson	Sterling	Walsh, Mass.

Mr. CURTIS. I announce the absence of the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] on official business. I will let this announcement stand for the present.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

EXPORT TRADE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, some publicity has been given to certain questions which were propounded by myself in writing to the President of the United States a few days since, during the conference between the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations and the President, and to the answers to such interrogatories furnished me by the President. I may say that such publicity was given by the White House and not by myself.

As it appears from the public press that in answer to the eighth interrogatory which I presented to the President reference was made to the answer of the President to another Senator, I desire not only to clear the record in that matter, but to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the President was not informed upon the particular matter in issue.

The eighth question, which is the one referred to, was as follows:

8. Are you issuing, or allowing to be issued, en bloc or otherwise, licenses to do business with those recently our enemies, and are you allowing ships and cargoes destined to ports of Germany or other recent enemy ports to clear from our ports?

To which the President answered:

I answered your eighth question in reply to a question asked me at our conference the other day.

Mr. President, a search of the record of the conference with the President will disclose that the only question asked upon that occasion dealing with the same matter was asked by the chairman of the committee, Senator LODGE. I have the record here before me. On page 53 it will appear that the chairman asked the President:

Are we not trading with Germany now, as a matter of fact?

The PRESIDENT. Not so far as I know, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Licenses certainly have been issued. It is advertised in all the New York papers.

The PRESIDENT. We removed the restrictions that were formerly placed upon shipments to neutral countries which we thought were going through to Germany.

The President of the United States first stated, in answer to the chairman, that we are not dealing with the enemy in so far as he knew. For the purpose of illuminating the subject somewhat I shall place certain documents in the RECORD, premising, however, by stating that the suggestion of the chairman that licenses were being issued or business done with Germany was based upon the record and hearings before the committee, where the attention of one of the witnesses was called to advertisements of the sailing of vessels with cargoes destined for Germany, such advertisements appearing in the New York papers.

The President was evidently entirely uninformed upon the subject. On July 14, 1919, there was issued "for immediate release" the following:

(For immediate release.)

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WAR TRADE BOARD SECTION,
Washington, July 14, 1919.

RESUMPTION OF TRADE WITH GERMANY.

The War Trade Board Section of the Department of State announces that a general enemy trade license has been issued authorizing all persons in the United States, on and after July 14, 1919, to trade and communicate with persons residing in Germany and to trade and communicate with all persons with whom trade and communication is prohibited by the trading-with-the-enemy act; subject, however, to the following specific limitations and exceptions, to wit:

1. The above-mentioned general license does not authorize the importation into the United States from Germany or elsewhere of dyes, dyestuffs, potash, drugs, or chemicals which have been produced or manufactured in Germany.

2. The above-mentioned general license does not modify or affect in any respect present restrictions against trade and communication between the United States and Hungary or that portion of Russia under the control of the Bolshevik authorities.

3. The above-mentioned general license does not authorize trade with respect to any property which heretofore, pursuant to the provisions of the trading-with-the-enemy act as amended, has been reported to the Alien Property Custodian or should have been so reported to him, or any property which heretofore, pursuant to the provisions of said act, the Alien Property Custodian has seized or has required to be conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid over to him.

On July 20 an amendment was made to the circular of instructions which I have just read, the only effect of which was to take potash out of the first exception and allow the free importation of potash into the United States. On August 7, 1919, the third paragraph was broadened with reference to the property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. President, in the month of June, as shown from the Government reports, prior to the issue of the circular of July 14, 1919, it will be ascertained that in that month, prior to the issue of the order suspending entirely the trading-with-the-enemy act, the export trade between this country and Germany was $8,783,000.13. During the same month the export trade with Spain was less than the export trade of this country with Germany herself.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will pardon me, I ask if that was for the month of June?

Mr. FALL. That was for the month of June.

Mr. LODGE. Prior to the order?

Mr. FALL. Prior to the order suspending absolutely the trading-with-the-enemy act and allowing citizens to trade with Germany freely.

Mr. LODGE. So my question whether we are not now trading with Germany as a matter of fact was not answered.

Mr. FALL. Not only so. The reports are not here, but I will state to the Senator, not only the trade with Germany during the month of July, after the trading-with-the-enemy act was suspended, but prior to the suspension by the issue of the order on July 14, in the month of June the export trade of this country with Germany was $8,783,000, while for the same period exactly the export trade of this country with Spain was $8,685,000, or $100,000 less. In the month of June alone the export trade of the United States with Germany was double the entire export trade of this country with all the Central American States on this continent.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. FALL. Allow me just a moment. The export trade during that time with the Central American States was $4,973,221, while for the same period the export trade with Germany was $8,783,000.

I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Does the report to which the Senator has referred indicate the character of those exports?

Mr. FALL. No, sir; and it was no purpose of mine to go into the details at this time. However, the Senator can easily ascertain it from the reports.

Mr. KING. The Senator has done so?

Mr. FALL. I have not specifically.

Mr. KING. I will ask the Senator, furthermore, if the report indicates whether those exports were landed in Germany or were transshipped?

Mr. FALL. I will satisfy the Senator. If he had waited a few moments, he would have avoided the necessity of his interruption.

Mr. KING. I am delighted to know that the Senator will cover the subject so comprehensively. It is very gratifying.

Mr. FALL. A little later I will go into the export trade since the trading-with-the-enemy act has been relieved. I am not prepared to do so at the present time, nor am I engaged in a general discussion of the proposition. I am referring to the answer of the President of the United States, and not to the details of the trade with Germany. The President of the United States says directly in answer to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that in so far as he knows we have not resumed trade with Germany. I am showing what the facts are of record; I am not accusing the President of the United States of dishonesty of purpose. I am bringing no charge whatsoever against him. I am producing the record. He said, "Not so far as he knew." I stated in the opening that he did not know, and I will prove it. I call to the attention of the Senate and place in the RECORD this fact:

Sailing from New Orleans to Liverpool on June 28 of the Waukegan, direct for Hamburg, which is a German port, with 22,710 bales of cotton. According to the Journal of Commerce and the Commercial Bulletin of Friday, August 22, 1919, the Waukegan sailed from Hamburg on July 27 after unloading her cargo of 22,000 bales of cotton.

Mr. President, at a later date I will go more fully into the trade relations between this country and Germany, and I shall undertake to the satisfaction of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to show what has been the course of that trade in the month of July, and particularly since the order was issued, which could only be issued by the authority of the President of the United States, suspending the trading-with-the-enemy act, an act of Congress. At this time my purpose was simply to call attention to the fact that the President was mistaken in his statement to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and was therefore in error in his answer to the eighth interrogatory which I propounded to him. That was my purpose and my sole purpose at this time.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, at the close of yesterday's session we adopted certain committee amendments to the pending bill, and during the discussion of the bill yesterday reference was made to that part of section 1 on page 2 following the word "provided," which reads:

That no alien shall, by stock ownership or otherwise, own any interest in a lease acquired under the provisions of this act, except as hereinafter provided, and all certificates for stock hereafter issued in any corporation having such a lease shall specifically and clearly show this provision on the face thereof.

As I stated yesterday, I recognize the seriousness of such a provision, as does every member of the Committee on Public Lands; but the control of oil produced in this country is of such great importance that the committee decided that some legislation must be had in order to give that control to our Government.

Yesterday the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] thought that there should be an amendment made in a way that would give the control of our Government over the oil produced in this country and at the same time not prohibit an alien from becoming interested in the production of oil in the United States. It was feared that there would be retaliation on the part of other countries if such a provision were enacted into law.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, the fear entertained by some of us was more that the legislation would be misunderstood in some countries and that through a misunderstanding some measures might be taken which would operate against the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from New Mexico, after consultation with other Senators, has agreed to a provision by way of amendment to section 1 which I am going to offer at this time:

After the word "except" in line 4, page 2, insert the following:
"With a specific provision in such lease authorizing the President in his discretion to take over and operate such lease, paying just compensation to the owner for the use of tools, appliances, machinery, and products, or to acquire at the market price all or any portion of the products of such leased property. And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may require the sale for consumption in the United States of all or any portion of the products of any leased property in which it appears that any alien has an interest by stock ownership or otherwise."

So that the proviso in section 1, beginning on line 2, page 3, will, if this amendment is adopted, read as follows:

That no alien shall, by stock ownership or otherwise, own any interest in a lease acquired under the provisions of this act except with a specific provision in such lease authorizing the President, in his discretion, to take over and operate such lease, paying just compensation to the owner for the use of tools, appliances, machinery, and products, or to acquire at the market price all or any portion of the products of such leased property: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may require the sale for consumption in the United States of all or any portion of the products of any leased property in which it appears that any alien has an interest by stock ownership or otherwise; and all certificates for stock hereafter issued in any corporation having such a lease shall specifically and clearly show this provision on the face thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I sincerely hope my colleague will not press that amendment in its entirety. Indeed, I think it is unwise, in view of the large land holdings which Americans have in other countries, in view of the fact that they will have additional holdings, and that, because we are a creditor nation, we will have to capitalize the amount which is due us and invest that capital in holdings in other nations. As I was saying, I hope the Senator from Utah will not press his amendment, and I doubt the wisdom of the provision found in the bill itself.

However, the principal objection I have to the Senator's amendment is that it empowers the President of the United States to enter upon the work of operating oil wells within the United States. I think that is unwise; I think it is a species of landlordism and of governmental operation of properties that will prove very injurious and will establish a precedent that will be vexatious and, indeed, harmful. If the Senator desires to elaborate his statement, I shall pretermit any observations until he concludes.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. KING. But I do assert now that, in my opinion, the proposed amendment is a very unwise one. I think it would be a very mistaken policy to authorize the Executive to go out upon the public domain and operate oil wells and to justify their operation because some alien has an interest in the wells.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the seriousness of this situation can only be appreciated by Senators when they know the exact state of affairs existing not only in our own country but in all the world. My colleague will note that this provision only relates to the sale of oil for consumption in the United States. Unless there are discovered larger oil fields than we have today in the United States and unless they are multiplied in number it is going to be only a very short time until there will not be sufficient oil produced in the United States to take care of the requirements of this country. What that would mean in case of war I take it for granted every Senator will recognize.

This provision is not mandatory. I quite agree with my colleague that the original provision would no doubt bring retaliation from foreign countries; but if my colleague will carefully read the amendment he will see that it does not prevent a foreigner from owning stock in an oil well in this country; in fact, foreigners may own the whole of the stock of such companies and may produce oil from, perhaps, some of the greatest oil wells in the United States; but if the time comes when the United States in its own interest is compelled to use such oil it is proposed to give power to the President to take over and operate such wells. Unless that is done, it seems to me the only other way is to prohibit the exportation of oil entirely. I think that this is far better than going to that extent.

There is nothing in this amendment to which a foreign country can object. Remember, all of this oil is produced from public lands which are owned by the United States, and the President is given power here to operate the oil wells referred to only in case the oil is needed for consumption in the United States and——

Mr. KING. Will my colleague yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Does the senior Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not quite read the amendment as it was interpreted by my colleague. The words of the amendment are as follows:

With a specific provision in such lease authorizing the President, in his discretion, to take over and operate such lease, paying just compensation to the owner for the use of tools, appliances, machinery, and products.

It is not limited to governmental necessities; it is not limited to the exigency of war. It leaves it to the discretion of the President to take over and operate the lease at any time, under any circumstances, at the importunity of governmental ownership advocates who may insist that this step be taken as an entering wedge to governmental ownership and operation of other properties.

If my colleague will pardon me, I would not object to a provision that, in the event of governmental requirement—that is to say, if the Government itself needed the oil—there should be a provision in the lease that the owner of the field should give the option to the Government to purchase. Indeed, I do not think such a provision as that would be necessary; I think the Government, by condemnation, could take the oil supply of an alien or of an American to meet the demands of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to my colleague in that connection that if it is confined to the limit just named by him, the President of the United States will have to be the judge whether or not the oil is necessary or required by the Government; and under this amendment that is exactly what the President would do.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, if an alien secures a lease upon valuable oil properties in this country we desire a provision which will compel him to work them or which will allow us to work them when the oil is needed. That is the prime object of this provision, as I understood it after conversation with my colleagues—that no alien should be allowed to acquire property and then refuse to work it, or in any way hamper the production or have the power to work it and take the oil out of this country if it were needed here. The discretion is given the President to remedy those well-recognized evils.

If the Senator from Utah will allow me for a moment, Mr. President, I desire to say that the oil question is the gravest question for consideration on this hemisphere at this time. It is something with which the Congress of the United States can not deal piecemeal. With one branch of the Government now engaged in dealing with this question with other nations of this hemisphere, not only on this continent but on the southern continent of this hemisphere, and engaged in very intimate communication with those countries from moment to moment in connection with this very proposition, it behooves the Congress of the United States, in considering the subject, and particularly with the question of alien ownership, to legislate with an eye to the best interest of the people of this country, first, last, and all the time; but, second, to the interest of the trade and commerce of this country with the other countries on this hemisphere, at any rate.

The necessity for it could not be more clearly proven than by citing the situation of Italy during the present war. Italy had no oil fields; she had no coal fields; she was without the commonest necessities for carrying on war. We saw what disasters overtook her because we could not get coal or oil to her rapidly enough; we saw her gallant armies forced back and almost annihilated because her allies could not get supplies to her. I hope we will all look forward to the future of this country; that we will conserve our present oil resources; that we will encourage our citizens to go throughout the world and by their individual effort, without any assistance except the tacit encouragement of their Government and its protection behind them, acquire the inexhaustible resources that exist on this continent and the southern continent for the benefit of our people, so that this country may not find itself in the condition that Italy discovered herself to be in during the war with Germany.

Mr. KING. Will my colleague permit me to interrupt?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think, if I interpret the Senator from New Mexico correctly, that I agree absolutely with all he has said.

Mr. FALL. I am satisfied of that.

Mr. KING. I think in this legislation the interests of our country should be of the first importance.

Mr. FALL. Exactly.

Mr. KING. But we must be careful in this legislation not to establish any precedent that will justify retaliatory legislation upon the part of other Governments.

Mr. FALL. Precisely.

Mr. KING. As the Senator has said, we want Americans to use their initiative and the splendid qualities that lead them into adventure and into progressive fields to go into other countries and discover oil fields, but we do not want retaliatory legislation from Mexico or from Colombia or other South American or other nations that will confiscate oil fields or other possessions of Americans.

Mr. FALL. No.

Mr. KING. Americans have oil fields in Mexico, in Colombia, in Cuba, in Panama, and in many other countries. We should proceed with the utmost caution in legislating now to establish no precedent that could be utilized justly by other nations to make a drive against the possessions and ownership of Americans in other countries, and I am afraid that this legislation, unless it is very carefully drawn and very carefully phrased, will be seized upon as an excuse, particularly by Mexico, to confiscate the holdings of Americans in that Republic.

Mr. FALL and Mr. PHELAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield first to the Senator from New Mexico; and then I should like to proceed.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I simply wish to state to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that it was with an eye to that very purpose that this amendment was suggested by myself yesterday and has finally been agreed upon. If the Senator will note the amendment in its entirety, I think he will become satisfied that no retaliatory legislation of any kind or character will be justified or called for, or, in so far as we can prevent it, will be permitted after its adoption. We must realize of course that other countries have the sovereign rights which we maintain; we must realize and recognize that if Mexico or Colombia need oil for their own domestic consumption they should have the first call upon the product of their respective countries. Therefore, if they should adopt an exactly similar amendment in connection with any of their legislation, I think we would have no just right to make complaint. The amendment, however, refers, as their legislation to follow this would necessarily refer, to the property belonging to the respective Governments, and not in any way, either as we would adopt it or as it might be adopted elsewhere, could it refer to any private property now owned, or prior to this time acquired, or acquired hereafter, in any other way except by specific lease of the public properties of the Government. If retaliatory legislation were suggested, provided it followed the lines laid down by us, it would be perfectly legitimate legislation, as to which we would have no just cause for complaint.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of my colleague to the fact that there was a shortage of 5,000,000 barrels of oil in the United States on the 1st day of June, 1919, as compared with the 1st day of June, 1918, notwithstanding the fact that great oil fields have been discovered in Texas and at the present time are in operation. The Texas oil fields are now producing about 250,000 barrels of oil a day. Suppose the Texas fields had not been opened, think of what our oil stocks would have been on June 1, 1919. I wish to impress upon the Senator the serious situation our country is in so far as oil is concerned.

I fully agree with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] as to the provisions of the amendment. I believe that to the provisions of the amendment, if adopted as amended, no foreign country can take exception, and if any foreign country should in its legislation enact a similar provision, I can not see that we, in the United States, could object to it in any way. It is for that reason that I offer the amendment; and I am quite sure that my colleague will admit that it insures us against the likelihood of retaliatory legislation on the part of any country much better than the original provision did.

Mr. PHELAN and Mr. STERLING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Utah yield?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from California rose first, so I will yield to him, and then I will yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah, which I have not read, but have only heard——

Mr. SMOOT. I will give the Senator a copy.

Mr. PHELAN. I have a copy now. I understand that amendment provides that in case of national emergency the President may take over foreign-owned oil wells.

Mr. SMOOT. The President may do it at any time under the provisions of the amendment.

Mr. PHELAN. But in the meantime foreign corporations may acquire oil properties in the United States. The original provision which the Senator seeks to amend reads as follows:

Provided, That no alien shall, by stock ownership or otherwise, own any interest in a lease acquired under the provisions of this act, except as hereinafter provided, and all certificates for stock hereafter issued in any corporation having such a lease shall specifically and clearly show this provision on the face thereof.

The purpose of that provision, as agreed upon in the committee, was to prevent foreigners from acquiring under this proposed act the public lands of the United States for oil exploitation. I am advised by the State Department this morning that in the event of the enactment of this bill there will be no parallel between conditions in Mexico and in the United States; that Mexico has sought to confiscate lands which are in private ownership, while this is really an attempt on the part of the United States—I claim a belated attempt—to protect its public lands against ownership by foreign nationals.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not believe for a minute that the act of the Mexican Government in confiscating those oil lands in Mexico in private ownership will ever stand, does he?

Mr. PHELAN. I do not believe that it will stand; but the fear of those who have interests in Mexico—although I did not understand that the Senator from New Mexico entertained that fear—was that Mexico would take this action, if taken by the Congress, as an excuse for interfering with the rights of American owners in Mexico. It is more a fear; but, as I inform you, the State Department is not of the opinion that the case is at all parallel.

Why was this matter brought up? It is because the United States has slowly realized, as Great Britain slowly realized up to the time of the war, that her natural resources were being taken by foreigners; and, with much foresight, England has now organized a bureau of the cabinet for the purpose of aiding her corporations in the acquisition of oil fields throughout the world.

I beg to call your attention in this connection to the report of the Chief of the Bureau of Mines, Mr. Van. H. Manning, under the heading of "Great Britain," on pages 3306-3309 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In answer to the question, "How are these Governments trying to control the situation?" he says:

(1) By creating a permanent governmental petroleum department (the petroleum executive under the war cabinet is to be made permanent) with powers and duties as follows: (a) To act as an advisor in petroleum matters to all other branches of His Majesty's Government; (b) to grant concessions for all oil development within the British Empire; and (c) to advise and assist British oil companies in securing concessions, carrying on work, and conducting trade in other countries.

(2) By debarring foreigners and foreign nationals from owning or operating oil-producing properties in the British Isles, colonies, and protectorates.

Prospecting for petroleum or working a petroleum property is lawful in the United Kingdom only for the board of trade or minister of munitions or person or persons authorized by them. (D. O. R. A., 2-A A A, Jan 31, 1919.)

(3) By direct participation in ownership and control of petroleum companies.

(4) By refusing permission to British oil companies to sell their properties to foreign-owned or controlled companies.
(5) By orders in council that prohibit the transfer of shares in British oil companies to other than British subjects or nationals.

Mr. President, with respect to the fears of retaliation, I desire to point out that already Great Britain has begun the acquisition on behalf of Great Britain of the oil supplies of the world, for the reasons which the Senator from Utah in his opening address stated—that oil has become the chief product necessary for the maintenance of both the merchant marine and the navy—so that is a matter of the greatest national importance.

I inserted in the RECORD on last Monday a statement from the London Times which will illustrate this very clearly to you.

It speaks of the concessions of the great companies just organized, called the British Controlled Oil Fields (Ltd.), and it is stated that—

These concessions stretch from the frontier of Mexico right away to Brazil, forming an almost uninterrupted chain of concessions and properties encircling approximately two-thirds of the Caribbean Sea, with numerous ports on the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. The areas comprised in these great possessions already amount to over 18,000,000 acres, and will at the conclusion of satisfactory negotiations, now in progress with various Republics, exceed this figure many times over.

Now, here is the point: This gentleman, who was explaining to his stockholders the great possessions of this company and its policy, says that—

A voting trust has been created, which will be permanent, and the result of which will be that, no matter who may acquire controlling share interests, however financially powerful they may be (none of them) can ever divert a single barrel of oil from national or imperial requirements. For all time, in some instances, and in others for the full life of the concessions, adequate supplies of oil, we may confidently assume, should the fields develop at the ratio we are led to believe they will, will be at the disposal of either the Imperial Government or the nation.

I merely wish to emphasize the fact that we are not initiating this legislation. We find that Great Britain is controlling the oil fields of the world, and debars our nationals from participating in exploration or exploitation, so far as she can control them; and certainly she refuses to them the privilege of owning any stock in any foreign corporation. Therefore we are entirely within our rights when we pass a provision such as is contained in the bill reported from the committee, denying to the alien the right to stock ownership in companies organized under this act in the matter of the disposition of the public domain. I am informed by the State Department that there is little danger, as I informed you, in the Mexican situation, and I do not know where else we fear any danger.

If we confine our public domain to our own citizens, the worst that any other country could do would be to confine its public domain to its own citizens; but if Americans anywhere in the world can acquire private property and exploit it for oil there will be no parallel and therefore no reason for retaliation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hardly think any Senator could make a statement which would be more convincing to me that the amendment I have offered should be adopted than that which has just been made by the Senator from California.

There is no question in the world that there is a fight on between the different countries of the world to control the oil of the world. There is no question but that England has the start of all other countries. There are things that have been told me by the department that I can not repeat upon the floor of the Senate now—I do not think it would be wise; but I do believe that the President of the United States—and I do not care who the President may be or what time it may be in the future—when he finds that the oil produced in the United States is controlled by foreigners, should have the power to say that that oil so produced shall be sold for consumption in the United States. And, if all the reports be true, it may be but a very few years until most of the production of oil in this country is controlled by foreigners.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt to ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator admits that there is a falling off in the supply; that is to say, that our consumption is pressing hard upon our production. Why, therefore, should a foreign corporation be allowed to take from the soil, say, of Texas or California, as they are doing, vast quantities of oil for export, if you please?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that American interests are also taking oil out of Mexico, and they are now interested in the development of some of the great oil fields in South America. I will say frankly to the Senator that I do not want to pass a provision in this bill that will give a foreign country an excuse for retaliating against this country in any way, shape, or form.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator does not expect retaliation from England?

Mr. SMOOT. You can not word a provision here that will apply to England. In England there are no oil wells to speak of. This proposed amendment will not affect England as to the producing of oil outside of the United States; and, if I am correctly informed, England now controls the wonderful oil fields of Persia, of Roumania, and of other countries, and she recognizes the fact that control of the oil of the world gives her control of the commerce of the world.

Mr. PHELAN. I know that the Senator fully sympathizes with the intent of the amendment; but if England has initiated this policy and controls the oil of the world to a very great extent, should we fear England as a matter of retaliation? Not at all. She has initiated it. Then whom shall we fear?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say frankly to the Senator why I am afraid of it. I am afraid that we can not produce in years to come, and at a time very near at hand at that, enough oil in our country to supply the demands of the country; and I do not want any action taken by us that will be the means of causing retaliation against us on the part of any other country.

Mr. PHELAN. But in the meantime, if these English corporations and French corporations and others have the right to acquire oil lands—because the amendment which the Senator proposes does not forbid them—they will be extracting this oil all the time.

Mr. SMOOT. They have a perfect right to come here now under this proposed amendment, and, if they can secure a lease, they can work the oil fields; but under this amendment the President of the United States can take the leased oil well at any time he may desire to do so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague permit me to ask a question of the Senator from California?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to his colleague?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from California favor this Government taking such a course as would justify other nations—all nations, for that matter—in immediately passing legislation that would forbid an American from acquiring any oil holdings in those nations?

Mr. PHELAN. I certainly am not in favor of that, and it is very hard to eat your pudding and still have it. We want to protect our American fields. We are all agreed as to that. To-day in California I know and can name three corporations that are acquiring and have acquired many fields, like the Coalinga and the Kern River, and under the name of the Dutch Shell Co., which is a subsidiary of the Royal Dutch Shell, which is owned by the Persian Co., whose stock is entirely owned by Great Britain; so Great Britain owns in California to-day vast productive oil fields.

Now, I wish to prevent further acquisitions by foreign governments in the national domain. There is nothing in this provision to prevent them from acquiring proved oil fields to-day in private hands, but only in the public domain; and the only retaliation in kind that might be made would be in South American or Central American countries, where they might deny Americans the privilege of developing the public domain. Now, I do not know and I am not informed as to the extent of their public domain. I think most of their valuable lands are already in private ownership.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from California knows that the southern countries are not going to differentiate between privately owned land in the United States and the public domain. That question has been thrashed over time and time again. They will never differentiate between the two; and if we pass a law such as we think ought to be passed—and yet there is apprehension in the mind of every Senator as to whether it should be done or not—I am fearful, as I said yesterday, that there would be retaliation.

Mr. PHELAN. Under the "most-favored-nation" clause, assuming that we have treaties of that kind with all these countries, in the event that we denied their nationals the privilege of exploiting our public domain, they could only deny our nationals the privilege of exploiting their public domain. If they went further than that, we would be denied the privileges which we enjoy under the "most-favored-nation" clause.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the proposed amendment they are not denied the right of securing a lease or stock in a company that has a lease; but it does reserve the right to the President of the United States to take that oil whenever he sees fit, if in his opinion it is necessary for the interests of all the people.

Mr. PHELAN. Of course, the Senator has in view the emergency of war. In the piping times of peace he would not dare to trespass upon the property of our esteemed allies and take their oil for merely commercial purposes, would he?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think we ought to have that right. As I said before, the time may come, and I believe it will come, when there will not be enough oil produced in this country to supply the demands of this country; and then I would not hesitate to say that the President of the United States ought to have the right to see that American-produced oil is not sent to foreign countries.

Mr. PHELAN. I agree with the Senator there, but I think we can prevent any intervention on behalf of the President by flatly denying the privilege now without any fear of retaliation.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course we could deny it; I admit that; but the wisdom of such an action is what we are discussing at this time, and I believe it would be unwise to go that far at this time, knowing the situation as I do.

Mr. PHELAN. In view of the example set us by England, which is the great oil cormorant of the world?

Mr. SMOOT. I understand just exactly to what extent she is securing oil interests in the world, and I believe to-day it would be unwise to say that no foreigner shall own one share of stock in a corporation that produces oil in this country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. It seems to me that the position taken by the Senator from Utah is the wise one, not only from the standpoint of what our policy at home should be, but from a consideration of the interests in oil which American citizens now have in other countries, and particularly in Mexico.

We have been accustomed up to this time to regard the Standard Oil Co. of the United States as the cormorant among oil owners and oil producers, to use an expression of the Senator from California. We are now losing sight of that fact and propose to insert here a restriction upon ownership that is bound to result in retaliations from other countries, and will at the same time put us in a position of extreme inconsistence in our dealings with Mexico.

One of the difficulties which is becoming very acute between the United States and Mexico arises from the proposed exclusion of alien ownership in Mexico of any oil interest whatever; and we can not, it seems to me, whatever Great Britain may have done, place a restriction of this kind in our own oil law and at the same time insist with any degree of justice or consistency that Mexico shall abandon the same policy which we propose to enforce. She may well reply, "We are simply doing what you are doing," and our retort that our restriction refers only to the public lands is merely a qualified denial of the charge.

The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] suggests that at best this would only give ground for retaliation to the extent to which the leases are made on public lands in other countries. But, Mr. President, retaliation once started always goes much further than the act which provokes it. That is the danger of retaliation. There can be no such thing as satisfaction to a retaliatory spirit that only stops by an equal amount of resistance. So we must bear in mind the effect of this qualification upon our own demands in Mexico.

So far as Great Britain's restriction is concerned, it may or may not justify us in adopting similar legislation; but if we adopt it, it should not be, I think, from any retaliatory spirit or because Great Britain has taken the same course. We can easily at any time place an embargo upon the exportation from the United States of oils produced here, whether produced by alien companies or by home companies. The product itself is subject to the jurisdiction of the Government of the United States. We have always had an inhibition upon the location of public lands by aliens. Some States have gone further and carried the prohibition of ownership to patent, but it has always been found to work badly, and in many States, I think in my own State, the experiment made has been abandoned. I do not perceive, in other words, the danger which many apprehend from absence of such a clause. I do perceive the possibilities that it would embarrass us very seriously in our future dealings with Mexico.

Mr. SMOOT. I thank the Senator for his suggestion, and I approve of every word he has said.

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield the floor, if the Senator desires.

Mr. STERLING. No; I merely wish to call attention to the amendment offered by the Senator. It seems to me that the amendment pretty effectually excludes any alien ownership in any of these mines, and that, possibly, was the intention; but it occurs to me that the provisions are pretty severe on American interests in any event, for it may by the power conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior operate to the disadvantage of American interests. The alien interest may be a very small interest, insignificant, in fact, and yet because there is that small alien interest the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to take possession and operate the entire leased property.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me ask the Senator a question there.

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. If there are Americans owning 90 per cent or 99 per cent of the stock of a company which may have a lease, and if they are not loyal enough to their own country to see that the oil produced by them went to their country if it was needed, why should they not lose all claim upon the protection of this bill and have no more protection under it than an alien could claim?

Mr. STERLING. They should.

Mr. SMOOT. They would be in the same position; and the President never would act in a case of this kind unless he knew that it was absolutely necessary for the good of the country in order that the properties should be operated for the welfare of Americans.

Mr. STERLING. If that were the attitude of the American owners in part of the leases, that should be the case, but they might not be able to purchase or control the alien interest.

Mr. SMOOT. If they own the controlling interest in the company, they certainly can control the directors of the company and they can control also the policy of the company. Therefore it seems to me that it would apply only in case a foreigner held the control. I think if American citizens owned the control it would be an American corporation and the policies would be such that it would be operated for the advantage of the American people.

Mr. STERLING. I simply wanted to call attention to what on the face of it seemed to me to be the situation, namely, that a foreign-controlled interest, however small, might put the leased property under the control of the President of the United States for the purpose of operating the lease and against the will and good intentions and purposes of the American owners. They might protest against it and yet in the discretion of the President, because there was this small alien interest, he could take possession.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. One further point, if the Senator will pardon me. The lines applicable to the amendment read as follows:

Provided, That no alien shall, by stock ownership or otherwise, own any interest in a lease acquired under the provisions of this act, except with a specific provision in such lease authorizing the President—

And so forth. Well, what about the original lease, which was a lease to American owners and the subsequent acquisition of one share of stock by an alien? Does it mean the cancellation of that lease and a rewriting of the lease with the specific provision in it to which the Senator's amendment applies?

Mr. SMOOT. There are no leases made under the provisions of the bill to date. Does the Senator mean after the lease is made?

Mr. STERLING. Yes. It would apply, I understand, to all time, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the provisions of the bill, wherever there is a lease made it must specifically provide in such lease "authorizing the President in his discretion," and so forth.

Mr. LENROOT. If it does not, the alien ownership is unlawful.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; if it does not so provide, as the Senator from Wisconsin suggests, the alien ownership is unlawful. In section 26 of the bill there is a provision that if it is unlawful it reverts back to the Government of the United States.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I offer a substitute to the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. As a substitute for the pending amendment?

Mr. KIRBY. A substitute for the whole measure. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHIPPS in the chair). The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to mine and develop coal, oil, and gas in any lands belonging to the United States and to operate the mines and wells under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Interior when, in his discretion, the public exigency may require that it shall be done.

Mr. SMOOT. The substitute is not in order to be voted upon at this time. When the bill is perfected the Senator can offer the substitute.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to offer it as an amendment at the proper time.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a pending amendment to the bill, and I have still another amendment to offer.

Mr. KIRBY. Very well; let it lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, one of the questions submitted to the Chief of the Bureau of Mines, who has made a special study of the question, was as follows:

What should be done to protect and encourage the American operator in his effort to get a fair share of the oil of the world for this country?

I think his answer should go in the RECORD. It is as follows:

(a) The Government of the United States should adopt a continuous, zealous, and effective policy of protecting the rights, properties, and lives of American nationals and citizens operating in other countries.

Fundamentally this policy is not altogether new. The Department of State has on more than one occasion made effective representations to other Governments relative to property rights of citizens of the United States.

(b) The fixed intent of the Government to follow this policy (a) should be made known to our own citizens and to foreign Governments.

This alone will do much to encourage and give assurance to American nationals to go abroad for production and to protect their rights and investments in foreign countries.

(c) The acquisition, ownership, and operation of oil-producing properties should be placed upon some basis of reciprocity internationally. Hence—

1. Representations should be made to those Governments which at present discriminate against or forbid the participation of American nationals within their boundaries or possessions on an equal footing with their own citizens to remove these restrictions; and if this endeavor fails

2. Companies organized or controlled in countries in which American companies are not permitted to acquire, own, or operate oil-producing properties should be prohibited from acquiring, owning, or operating such properties in the United States or its possessions.

It is believed that this last policy should be adopted only after failure of all ready means for securing equal participation by American nationals in the countries in question. Such a policy affords a precedent or justification to the less advanced countries, such as Mexico, which are neither able to develop their own natural resources or to participate in the development of ours, to discriminate against, to keep out, or to harrass American nationals.

(d) The control of American oil companies should be prevented from passing into foreign hands.

This is of immediate importance.

That is his final recommendation:

The control of American oil companies should be prevented from passing into foreign hands.

This is of immediate importance.

He points out in his report that American companies are now passing into foreign hands, and certainly to refuse to nationals of foreign countries the privilege of mining in our national domain under the provisions of this bill is a less offense than to deprive them of the ownership of their oil.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator see some incongruity in some of the recommendations contained in the document just read? As I understood, the statement contains a recommendation first that the rights of American citizens in other countries and their holdings in those countries, especially oil holdings, should be protected; that is to say, that our Government should vigorously assert the right of Americans to acquire and enjoy the peaceable possession of oil lands and other lands in other countries. Does not the Senator think that this recommendation is somewhat inconsistent with the last recommendation that we should deny the nationals of other countries the right to acquire oil lands in our country?

Mr. PHELAN. I do not know that the Senator followed the reading very closely.

Mr. KING. I think I did; at least I tried to do so.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Manning in his report very clearly says that this Government should protect its nationals in foreign countries, and it should endeavor by diplomatic means or by negotiation to remove all disqualifications against our nationals imposed by foreign countries; and then he says if this policy fails, if we can not get equal rights for our nationals in foreign lands, then it will be necessary for us to discriminate against the nationals of those foreign countries. So there is nothing inconsistent; it is in the alternative.

Mr. KING. I did not understand that it was alternative; but permit me to make this further inquiry of the Senator: Does Mexico discriminate against Americans? In other words, has Mexico forbidden Americans from acquiring oil or other lands in Mexico, unless section 27 of the new constitution which was adopted by the Carranza government constituted a prohibition? If the Senator will pardon me, I think he will be compelled to answer my question in the negative, that Mexico has not. And I might add that Cuba has not, Panama has not, Colombia has not, and no South American country so far as I know has legislated to prevent Americans from acquiring lands in those countries. If we should pass this bill in the form in which the Senator desires it, would it not prove to be an irritant and provocative of legislation by other nations aimed against Americans acquiring lands within their borders?

With the rather strained relations between the Mexican Government and Americans, I would regard any legislation upon our part which could be regarded as preventative of aliens from acquiring land in the United States as rather unwise. At least we should approach the subject with the utmost caution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. May I make a suggestion that might serve to clarify the situation and possibly offer a solution? Would it not meet the views of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] if an amendment such as this were incorporated after the word "alien," the last word in line 2, page 2 of the bill, "being a national of any country by whose laws or regulations citizens of the United States are denied the right to acquire or own oil lands or interest in companies or associations owning or operating such," so that it will read——

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that we thought of that amendment time and time again and it will not reach the situation. I will explain to the Senator in private why it will not do so.

Mr. PHELAN. I was asked a question by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I am in a position to answer him. We have already shown what England has done in denying to foreign nationals the right to hold stock in petroleum or oil companies. France is continuing the control through the Commissariat General aux Essence et Combustibles and allied bodies that were set up during the war, and is seriously considering making a State monopoly of petroleum and petroleum products.

Mexico has been studying the question of a State monopoly of production and distribution. Article 27 of the Mexican constitution of 1917 states that "in the nation is vested direct ownership of petroleum and all hydrocarbons—solid, liquid, or gaseous"; also that "only Mexicans by birth or naturalization and Mexican companies have the right to acquire ownership in lands, waters, or their appurtenances, or to obtain concessions to develop mines, waters, or mineral fuels in the Republic of Mexico. The nation may grant the same right to foreigners, provided they agree before the department of foreign affairs to be considered Mexicans in respect to the same, under penalty, in cases of breach, of forfeiture to the nation of property acquired."

On February 19, July 31, and August 12, 1918, decrees were issued making it necessary, under penalties of confiscation, for all companies owning or leasing oil lands in Mexico to file new manifests of properties already duly registered, and so forth.

Senators will remember that our Government has protested and that the diplomatic situation is very unsatisfactory between Mexico and the United States by reason of this threatened legislation, which not only affects the new exploitation to which I am not referring at all, but the private ownership legitimately acquired by the holders of Mexican properties. The other countries are more or less awakening to the importance for their own protection of guarding their oil supplies. The United States is one of the great oil reservoirs of the world; there seems to be no limit to its potential production of oil. California produced about 300,000 barrels a day and held the ranking position until only a few weeks ago, when Texas forged to the front, and now yields more than California and has taken the ranking position. So, in the United States there are great reservoirs of oil; and it is clearly our national duty to preserve them for our own use, especially in view of the fact that such Governments as France and Great Britain are organizing to acquire, and have their agents in the field and have the ability and the means of acquiring, oil properties and oil fields in the United States right under our very eyes. In the last three weeks a great oil property was transferred to England by an English firm in California comprising a great area of oil bearing and proved land. This is going on all the time, and there is nothing to prevent it. All that is now asked by the committee, as the bill came to the Senate in the first instance, is to deny foreigners that privilege on the public domain. I am going to confer with the chairman of the committee in regard to the matter. I do not know any public reason why we should modify the original language of the bill. I therefore ask, if it is agreeable to the chairman of the committee, unless he intends to press the bill to a vote to-day, that this amendment be passed over, so that we may complete the bill and leave what is clearly a debatable question for consideration later this evening or to-morrow.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator from California resumes his seat I should like to invite his attention to page 32 of the bill and to the language found in the section upon that page, beginning in line 6, which reads:

Such advertisement and sale shall reserve to the Secretary of the Interior the right to reject all bids and the right to require redelivery of the actual oil or gas or any refined product thereof——

Mr. PHELAN. If the Senator from Utah will excuse me, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he has not proposed an amendment to section 35. The junior Senator from Utah is criticizing the language found on page 32.

Mr. KING. I am not criticizing it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to my colleague that there will be an amendment offered to section 35. That section has been rewritten.

Mr. PHELAN. So that it would be idle to discuss it now.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I fancy there will be no material change made, however, in the language to which I am now calling attention, which is found in lines 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, on page 32. The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] directed my attention specifically to those words a moment ago.

Mr. SMOOT. Will my colleague kindly read the language?

Mr. KING. It reads:

Such advertisement and sale shall reserve to the Secretary of the Interior the right to reject all bids and the right to require redelivery of the actual oil or gas or any refined product thereof whenever within his judgment the interest of the United States demands.

I will ask my colleague whether or not the proposed amendment will modify that language?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. What the Senator has read has reference to royalty oil, while the amendment has reference to all the oil that may be produced.

Mr. KING. I was going to ask the Senator from Montana——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before we pass from that, I desire to say that I do not interpret the language of the amendment as now interpreted by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Wait until I read over the proposed amendment, that is the change, and see if what I have stated is not correct.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is no change of that portion, as I understand, I will say to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I call the Senator's attention to section 35 of the provision as amended. The original provision had reference to "all royalty oil and gas accruing or reserved to the United States under such lease."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think that I can not accept that interpretation. It does in fact read:

Upon granting any oil or gas lease under this act—

I read from the proposed amendment—and from time to time thereafter during said lease the Secretary of the Interior shall, except whenever in his judgment it is desirable to retain the same for the use of the United States, offer for sale for such period as he may determine, upon notice and advertisement on sealed bids or at public auction, all royalty oil and gas accruing or reserved to the United States under such lease.

Now, that clearly deals only with royalty oil; but, Mr. President, the next sentence is the one to which our attention is now invited by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], which provides:

Such advertisement and sale shall reserve to the Secretary of the Interior the right to reject all bids and the right to require redelivery of the actual oil or gas or any refined product thereof.

Undoubtedly that refers to royalty oil.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; there is not any doubt about it, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHIPPS in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. KING. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee, following the request of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], whether he would be willing to postpone the consideration of this section until other amendments are disposed of, if there should be any?

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that there is only one other amendment, I will say to the Senator; and if so, I will pass over the pending amendment temporarily and offer the other amendment at this time, and then recur to the one passed over.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I regard this matter as so very important that I think we should have full opportunity to consider the amendment tendered by the committee, as well as the entire subject of aliens acquiring interest in the oil lands of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered on page 2 will be passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on page 32 there was an amendment that was agreed to on yesterday; so I will ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which that amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the amendment referred to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was agreed to on yesterday, at the top of page 32. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, on page 32 I move to strike out from line 1 to line 21, inclusive, and to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 32 it is proposed to strike out from line 1 to line 21, both inclusive, as follows:

Upon granting any oil or gas lease under this act and at the beginning of each five-year period thereafter during said lease, the Secretary of the Interior shall offer for sale, upon notice and advertisement on sealed bids or at public auction, all royalty oil and gas accruing or reserved to the United States under such lease. Such advertisement and sale shall reserve to the Secretary of the Interior the right to reject all bids and the right to require redelivery of the actual oil or gas or any refined product thereof whenever within his judgment the interest of the United States demands; and in cases where no satisfactory bid is received or where the accepted bidder fails to complete the purchase, the Secretary of the Interior within his discretion may readvertise such royalty for sale, or sell at private sale for such period, or accept the value thereof from the lessee, in each case reserving the right to require redelivery of the oil or gas or any product being refined therefrom by such purchaser or lessee: Provided, however, That advertisement or sale as herein required may be dispensed with in specific cases upon a finding by the Secretary of the Interior that such course is in the interest of the public good.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Upon granting any oil or gas lease under this act, and from time to time thereafter during said lease, the Secretary of the Interior shall, except whenever in his judgment it is desirable to retain the same for the use of the United States, offer for sale for such period as he may determine, upon notice and advertisement on sealed bids or at public auction, all royalty oil and gas accruing or reserved to the United States under such lease. Such advertisement and sale shall reserve to the Secretary of the Interior the right to reject all bids and the right to require redelivery of the actual oil or gas or any refined product thereof whenever within his judgment the interest of the United States demands; and in cases where no satisfactory bid is received or where the accepted bidder fails to complete the purchase, or where the Secretary of the Interior shall determine that it is unwise in the public interest to accept the offer of the highest bidder, the Secretary of the Interior, within his discretion, may readvertise such royalty for sale or sell at private sale for such period or accept the value thereof from the lessee, in each case reserving the right to require redelivery of the oil or gas or any product being refined therefrom by such purchaser or lessee: Provided, however, That pending the making of a permanent contract for the sale of any royalty oil or gas as herein provided, the Secretary of the Interior may sell the current product at private sale: And provided further, That any royalty oil or gas may be sold at not less than the market price at private sale to any department or agency of the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think it was agreed that the words "at not less than the market price" should be stricken out.

Mr. LENROOT. They have been restored. The Senator from Utah suggested, in view of a share of the proceeds going to the States and into the reclamation fund, that those words ought to be retained.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Utah, I think on line 14 the word "oil" should follow the word "royalty." I think it should read "royalty oil."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the provision has reference only to royalty oil, so that there is no need of inserting the word "oil" there. It reads:

May advertise such royalty for sale—

Of course, it means royalty oil, because the whole provision refers to royalty of oil and nothing else.

Mr. PHELAN. Of course, royalty is one thing and royalty oil is another.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection particularly to inserting the word suggested, but I think it is unnecessary.

Mr. PHELAN. We are not selling royalty; we are selling oil.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if we do that we must also insert "gas." I submit to the Senator from California that no misconception could possibly arise in view of the whole purpose of the provision.

Mr. SMOOT. It will be impossible to misconstrue the wording. To insert the word suggested would only be a repetition that would be unnecessary.

Mr. PHELAN. Very well; if it is understood that we are not selling royalties under this provision.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has reference to the words "such royalty?"

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; to the words "such royalty."

Mr. SMOOT. That has reference to oil and gas.

Mr. PHELAN. I will leave it to the judgment of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment I have offered is the last one I have to present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to amendment submitted by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, I ask to recur to section 1 of the bill, on page 2, and take up the amendment that was pending before the amendment just agreed to was considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 4, after the word "except," it is proposed to insert:

with a specific provision in such lease authorizing the President, in his discretion, to take over and operate such lease, paying just compensation to the owner for the use of tools, appliances, machinery, and products, or to acquire at the market price all or any portion of the products of such leased property: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may require the sale for consumption in the United States of all or any portion of the products of any leased property in which it appears that any alien has an interest by stock ownership or otherwise.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word. Since the committee tendered the amendment which has just been laid before the Senate I have had an opportunity to give it more careful consideration. There are some provisions in it which are objectionable, and yet I think it is very much better than the provisions found on page 2 of the original bill. Believing that the results which will be obtained under the proposed amendment will be far better than those which will be realized under the original proposal, I shall interpose no objection.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am a little troubled about the concluding portion of the amendment. It reads:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may require the sale for consumption in the United States of all or any portion of the products of any leased property in which it appears that any alien has an interest by stock ownership or otherwise.

I put to the Senator from Utah the case of Americans who have secured a lease or a permit to prospect. The corporation is an American corporation.

Mr. SMOOT. The provision has no reference to permits, I will say to the Senator. It refers to leases, and, of course, oil will have to be discovered or the land will have to be within a geologic structure known to contain oil before the lease would be granted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well, then, take the case of a lease. An American corporation with stockholders all of whom are Americans secures a lease upon a property. They expend their money and develop it, are successful, and secure oil. They look for a market for their oil, find a foreign market, and sell their oil under contract to a foreign State or to the nationals of another country, as they are entitled to do. The law does not forbid them to do so at all, and they find an opportunity to make a profitable contract of that character, but some of their stock gets upon the market; it is dealt in on oil exchanges, and eventually a portion of that stock gets into the hands of a national of some other country. Thereupon the Secretary of the Interior sends a notice to them that they must not sell any more of their oil to the nationals of any foreign country and commands that they immediately break their contract with the foreigner. It seems to me that would be quite unfair.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there can be only one answer to that, it seems to me, and that is that the other owners of the stock, if such a thing as that happened, would have to buy the stock back at exactly what the foreigner paid for it, and that is what would happen.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. If the owners put the stock upon the market and some of it fell into the hands of foreigners, if that fact were discovered—and it would have to be discovered under the provisions of the bill—the other stockholders of the company would have to buy the stock back, and undoubtedly would buy it, and I do not think they would pay any more than the foreigner paid for it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course that would be a solution, but the foreigner would be at liberty to sell or to hold it as he saw fit, and he might ask an exorbitant price. No possible delinquency could be assigned to the other stockholders of the company.

Mr. SMOOT. This proposed law gives notice to the stockholders of every producing American oil company and to those who intend or undertake to produce oil in the United States under acquired leases—and this is a leasing provision—that no foreigner shall purchase such stock unless the company itself shall comply with the provisions of the law.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is something in that suggestion.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all there is of it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That possibly may take care of the situation, but it would really in a way impel every American corporation to put a provision in its articles of incorporation or in its by-laws to the effect that no transfer of the stock of the corporation for any lease would be recognized as a valid transfer.

Mr. SMOOT. That would be in every lease, I will say to the Senator, and not only that, but this provision will require that—

All certificates for stock hereafter issued in any corporation having such a lease shall specifically and clearly show this provision on the face thereof.

That is in order to protect the United States; and if the company, after they have received notice from Congress, desire to go out and sell their stock to foreigners, they must take the consequences.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The trouble about that is that stocks get upon the market in many ways. The stock of a stockholder might be seized under attachment and sold, and thus get out of his control. It also passes by inheritance; so that it might easily, without any delinquency whatever upon the part of other stockholders, pass into the hands of an alien. What occurred to me was that protection might be afforded by such a provision in the articles of incorporation and by-laws as I have suggested, but I fear very much that by-laws of that kind might be regarded as invalid, and I think we have treaties with quite a number of the countries of the world at least providing that their nationals shall be entitled to inherit property upon exactly the same terms and conditions as the citizens of this country.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a provision in section 26 of this bill allowing a foreigner to inherit such stock, but he can only hold it for the length of two years. It must be disposed of within a period of two years.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. It seems to me that there can be no difficulty, because in any contract made with a foreigner, such as the Senator from Montana suggests, there would necessarily be incorporated in the contract this very provision, that if at any time the Secretary of the Interior should exercise this right it would determine the contract.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I regret that the Senators do not appear to view the situation from the standpoint from which I desire that they should look at it. Of course, so far as the foreign purchaser is concerned, he gets only what he deserves. He buys it knowing this provision of the statute, and knowing that the contracts of the company with foreign nationals may be canceled, and he deserves his fate, because he buys in the face of the law. But I should like to have you consider the matter from the standpoint of the original American stockholders who went into the company. They are, let us say, 10 in number. They are all Americans. Their corporation is an American corporation. They get this lease. They put their money into the development of the property, and they get the property, and then they make the contract to sell, as they have a right to do under the law. Now, one of these stockholders dies, and his stock is thrown upon the market in some way. Another is unfortunate, and his property is seized under attachment, and it is sold. A third falls out with the rest of his associates, and he finds an opportunity to sell his stock to a foreigner. Now, as I say, the foreigner deserves his fate; but what about the seven original Americans?

Mr. LENROOT. How are they to be greatly injured? They have two remedies. If they can not buy any stock, the only injury to them is that they are compelled to sell in the domestic market.

Mr. SMOOT. Providing the Secretary of the Interior so states.

Mr. LENROOT. Providing the Secretary of the Interior so states.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I respectfully submit for the consideration of the Senators that that is not the only thing they have suffered. Their corporation has a contract under which they agree to deliver the entire product of their wells for a period of three years to a foreign national, and six months of that period has expired, and their contract is canceled, and they can not supply it, and their corporation is responsible in damages to the foreign company which has the contract with them which may possibly eat up their entire property.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly not, because if this provision is incorporated in the contract, that whenever the Secretary of the Interior exercises this discretion it shall terminate the contract, they certainly can not be made responsive in damages.

Mr. SMOOT. And not only that, but the corporation certainly would not make any contract for three years unless it was distinctly understood in the contract under which they were operating the well. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have said all I care to say about it, and I do not care to oppose the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to call the Senator's attention to section 26, on page 26, which takes care of the question of will or descent, and other questions, too:

> Any interests held in violation of this act shall be forfeited to the United States by appropriate proceedings instituted by the Attorney General for that purpose in the proper United States district court, except that any ownership or interest forbidden in this act which may be acquired by descent, will, judgment, or decree may be held for two years and not longer after its acquisition.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but, Mr. President, if the Senator will give me his attention for a moment I will show him that that does not affect the situation at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Only to a certain degree, I will admit; but it does seem to me, Mr. President, that as this law provides that this provision shall be made part of the lease, any corporation taking a lease under this provision certainly would not take the contract of any foreign country to deliver oil for three years without making an exception in the contract to cover the very provisions that they are required to accept in their lease.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But, Mr. President, even if they did, that would not solve the difficulty. Here is the situation: Even if that were true, and even if they could make a contract of that character, so as to relieve themselves from damages, the situation would be this: The American corporation into which unfortunately a foreign stockholder was introduced would thereafter be restricted in the market for its product to the American market.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what we want.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. While its competitor on the other side of the field may sell anywhere it sees fit.

Mr. SMOOT. He may, unless the President thinks it is for the best interests of this country to direct otherwise.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Both of them are subjected to that exigency; but the corporation and the stockholders that have been entirely innocent are restricted to the American market, while their competitors on the other side of the field are entitled to sell their product anywhere they may see fit.

Now, if the Senator will pardon me for saying another word, I have no purpose except to help make the bill so that it will be just and right.

Mr. SMOOT. I am well aware of that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The transfer to which the Senator referred is all right. If the foreigner gets that stock, he may hold it only two years, and proceedings are instituted by which he shall be eventually divested of it.

That takes it away from him; but in the meanwhile the corporation itself and the other innocent stockholders of the corporation are subjected to all the disadvantages accruing by reason of the section to which I have now called your attention. I was just hoping that the end could be attained by making some provision that would meet the difficulty to be overcome, and yet not do what seems to me to be a manifest injustice.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator think the Secretary of the Interior would take that into consideration? The provision is that the Secretary of the Interior may require the sale. It does not say that he shall, and I do not believe that any Secretary of the Interior in a case like that would ever cancel the lease because of the mere fact that it did go into the hands of a foreigner. All that could possibly happen is that when a foreigner purchased stock and the company found out that he was a foreigner, they could say, "Here, we do not want to transfer this stock to you. We will purchase it back from you at the price that you gave for it."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, I am not one of those who are not willing to trust any discretion whatever in the Secretary of the Interior. I believe that as a rule, in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred, in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of one thousand, it would be all right; but we can easily conceive that a Secretary of the Interior might desire to give to one corporation an advantage over another corporation, and he might seize this opportunity to confine one of them to the American market, while its competitor would have the whole world for its market.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, of course, as the Senator is well aware, there is no case where a possible injustice can not be conceived of in the administration of a law; but, bearing in mind the purpose of this entire matter to prohibit, in so far as it is injurious to the interests of the United States, the domination or ownership by foreigners of the oil supply of this country, this provision does accomplish it, and no serious inequity or injustice can result, because, as I stated a little while ago, so far as a contract with foreigners is concerned, the lessee can protect himself by incorporating in the contract a provision that in case any stock of the lessee shall ever be held by an alien, and the Secretary of the Interior shall exercise his discretion requiring his product to be sold for domestic consumption, the contract shall be terminated. The only injustice that could possibly arise then would be to confine the lessee to the American market; that is all.

But it is not conceivable that the Secretary of the Interior would ever exercise that discretion except in cases where all of the oil produced in this country ought to be confined to the American market, because, as has been stated a number of times upon the floor to-day, the nation that controls the oil supply of the future controls the commerce of the future, and so far as the real beneficent provisions of this amendment are concerned it will prevent the acquirement and domination of oil wells in this country by foreign Governments or combinations of individuals of other nations so as to control the supply in the interest of their Governments, because with this amendment, if that is done, the Secretary of the Interior can at any time require that the sale be made for domestic consumption, and that every barrel of the product of these wells under alien ownership shall be used for the benefit of Americans.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry before he takes his seat?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The Senator has stated that this bill will prevent aliens from dominating the oil situation in the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I said to the detriment of the United States.

Mr. KING. Well, to the detriment of the United States, then. The bill itself prevents an alien from obtaining a lease, as I understand its terms.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. Then the amendment which is now the subject of consideration provides that the Secretary of the Interior may require the sale for consumption in the United States of all or any portion of the products of any leased property in which it appears that any alien has an interest by stock ownership or otherwise. So that, first, with the provision that no alien may obtain a lease, and secondly, with the provision that if any alien acquires even a small stock ownership in a lease or in a corporation having a lease, the Secretary of the Interior may require the sale of the product of the property in the United States, I ask the Senator whether that will not have the effect of deterring any alien from acquiring any interest in a lease or in a corporation that may have a lease; and therefore will not the bill prohibit aliens from acquiring any interest in the oil lands of the United States?

Mr. LENROOT. It would not prohibit it. I wish it could, but it would not prohibit it; and it does avoid the objection that has been raised to the provision as reported by the committee, that it would lead to retaliation by Mexico and South America.

Mr. KING. Now, let me ask the Senator this question, because that was what I was leading up to: The Senator considers it desirable, as I understand his attitude, to prohibit any foreigner from acquiring any interest in any oil lands in the United States?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. KING. If other nations took the same view and enacted legislation to accomplish that object, does the Senator think that in the long run we would be the beneficiaries? In other words, does not the Senator think that the oil fields of the future—and the immediate future, too—lie outside of the territorial boundaries of the United States and that Americans will be compelled to go into other lands in order to obtain the oil which is so essential in commerce and for other purposes? And, if I may add another question to that, Does not the Senator think that in dealing with this very important matter it is the part of wisdom to look beyond the immediate horizon, to look to the morrow instead of confining all of our attention to the present? I confess I am looking to the future welfare of our country as well as to its present welfare. I am seeking to anticipate what the future demands of our country will be; and I am afraid—I will speak very frankly—that this measure, guarded as carefully as the learned and able Senators have been able to guard it with a view to preventing the domination by foreigners of the oil in the United States, will be seized upon as a pretext, possibly a legitimate pretext, for other nations to put up the bars; and whereas we have put up one bar, they may put up two or three or four, and finally erect a tight fence, so that Americans will be precluded from getting oil or acquiring other properties in countries with whom our relations are now of a friendly character. We need many things which come from other lands. There is danger in erecting barriers against others when they have the power to erect barriers against us. We need platinum, tin, rubber, pyrites, and many other articles and commodities. We want friendly relations with all nations and should avoid any act which may call for retaliatory measures. I am afraid that if we establish a precedent here that precludes the nationals of other countries from acquiring lands in the United States we will be the sufferers.

As I said a few moments ago, we are now the creditor Nation of the world. If we continue to export, of necessity we will be compelled to convert the interest upon our securities and the trade balances into capital for investment in other lands. They will become capital, and we are bound, if we trade, to become property owners in Europe, in South America, and in other countries, particularly those where the balance of trade is against them and in our favor. In this new day, when there is, I hope, a broader spirit of humanity, a feeling that we are in part our brothers' keepers, and that the world is being linked together with business and other ties, it seems to me that it is the part of wisdom to appreciate the fact that we may, by drastic legislation—by provincial legislation, if I may be permitted—bring upon our heads legislation that in the long run will be harmful to the American people.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am very glad to reply to that. It is because I do think we should look to the future, instead of merely to the immediate horizon, that I believe this provision should be adopted. So far as the oil supply for America is concerned, we will not find it in Great Britain; we will not find it in Asia, nor will we find it anywhere in Europe. Outside of our own supplies, we must look for it in Mexico and in South America. Does the Senator think that the capitalists of Mexico are eager to get into the American oil fields, and that they are going to be deprived of something substantial because Mexican capitalists can not come and get a lease in the United States?

Mr. KING. No; but, if the Senator will pardon me, I am afraid that Mexico, with whom we are now having difficulty, may seize upon this legislation as an excuse to enforce article 27 of her constitution, and to adopt legislation such as this—that any oil produced in Mexico, whether by nationals or by foreigners, shall, at the option of the Government, be sold to the Government or sold in Mexico; in other words, that discretion be given to some executive in Mexico to seize the oil and sell it there whenever that official may deem that the public good of Mexico requires that it be sold in Mexico. That could easily be done by Mexico.

Mr. LENROOT. That is possible, but the danger that the United States has confronting it with reference to the oil supply is not from any action of Mexico; it is not from any action of any South American country; it is from the attitude of a certain great power, and I do not criticize it for looking to the future, for, as the Senator says, we should look to the future in attempting to dominate the commerce of the world by controlling the oil supply of the world. That nation can compete with the United States or any private capital in the United States in dominating the supply in Mexico or in South America, and if in addition to that you allow them to control the supply of the United States that nation has the United States at its mercy. We can at least protect our own supply, and then we can trust to the future to get a fair measure of justice for our capital in other countries.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin, whose desire to protect the public interests is well known, two questions with reference to the bill. First, I should like to ask him why there is not a provision in the bill permitting the Government to operate oil wells in case a lease is canceled for any reason by the Government; and, secondly, I should like to ask him, in view of the fact that this property is the property of the people of the United States, why some provision has not been made to fix a limit upon the price which the lessees who own this property can charge the consumers.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad to answer the Senator's questions. I will say that in the nearly 10 years in which I have been actively connected with this legislation, during which time Congress has been attempting to secure legislation with reference to the oil supply of the Government, we have had up many times the question of whether it would not be feasible to regulate the price of oil, but we have never found it so, because oil can not be used coming from the wells for domestic consumption. Oil must be refined. To fix the price of oil at the well and then let the Standard Oil Co. refining it charge all it may please to the consumer will simply add to the profits of the Standard Oil Co.

As suggested by the Senator from Utah, of course, a uniform price can not be fixed with reference to a reasonable profit upon each well because one well may cost $25,000 and on another location or claim a half million dollars may have been expended for exactly the same production that is being produced in another case by an expenditure of $25,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I can appreciate the impracticability of fixing a definite price. Of course, my question assumed that there would be some reviewing board of the Government which would fix the price, giving it that authority.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, it would not be at all possible to compel the lessee to himself refine the oil from the market. If we could do that we might regulate the price.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I ask the Senator to state whether he has any objection to an amendment giving the Government authority to operate a well where there is a lease in existence which the Secretary of the Interior has canceled?

Mr. LENROOT. Which he has canceled because of a violation of its terms?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the bill already provides just how such a case as that shall be taken care of. I certainly do not want to inject that question now into the bill, and I will certainly object to any such amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask what is the provision that covers it now?

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary of the Interior can re-lease the property.

Mr. McKELLAR. Suppose the well was in operation?

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary of the Interior is not going to take any action until he has provided somebody to take over the lease. I am quite sure of that.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to suggest to both Senators that the Secretary of the Interior has no right or authority under the bill to cancel a lease. It can only be canceled by judicial procedure and a forfeiture, and in that case the Secretary either would have to operate it or it would have to be operated by a lessee.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt in the world that that is true.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I desire to offer some amendments to the bill. I ask to have them read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment pending. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. PHELAN. Is that the main amendment that has just been discussed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the amendment to section 1.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. PHELAN. I have the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely want to call the attention of the Chair to the parliamentary situation.

Mr. PHELAN. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] sent some proposed amendments to the desk, which he asks to have read.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is my request.

Mr. PHELAN. It is true that the Senator from Massachusetts offered amendments, but it was while the other amendment was pending and had not been disposed of, and his proposed amendments did not purport to be amendments to the pending amendment. They are not amendments to the amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They are not.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Massachusetts merely wishes to have his amendments read.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; and to lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendments intended to be proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Secretary read as follows:

On pages 4 and 5, line 25, strike out the following: "nor more than 20 cents per ton."

On page 6, lines 17 and 18, strike out the following: "three hundred and twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the words "twenty-five hundred and sixty."

On page 13, line 7, strike out "not more than 25 per centum."

On page 14, line 23, strike out the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof "five."

On page 14, line 25, strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

On page 16, line 2, strike out the following: "not more than 25 per centum."

On page 20, lines 4 and 5, strike out the following: "not more than 25 per centum."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. PHELAN. I yield to the Senator for the purpose of a question.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I want to say briefly——

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he will not allow the Senate to vote upon the pending amendment and then his amendments will follow?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I wish to address myself to the pending amendment. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] addressed the Senate a moment ago, but I was not quite sure whether he advocated the original provision in the bill, on page 2, or whether he accepted the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], which radically changes the section.

Mr. LENROOT. I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah solely for the reason that it does obviate retaliation and does at the same time, I think, protect the United States in that it can secure the entire product of the oil wells owned by aliens whenever——

Mr. PHELAN. But does the Senator not know that in practice this land will be acquired one way or another by, for instance, the Royal Dutch Shell, and the mines or wells will be operated and the oil will be taken out and diverted from the United States, and this will go on for an indefinite period of time, until some day we shall realize that we are at war, and there is a great emergency, and then the President, under the powers granted by this amendment, will act, but not until then?

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator will bear in mind that there are two separate provisions—one that the President at any time may take over and operate the wells, and, secondly, that the Secretary of the Interior may at any time require that the entire product of the wells shall be sold for domestic consumption. I agree with the Senator that it would only be in the case of an emergency that the President would act, but in the case of action by the Secretary of the Interior I would assume that the Secretary would act whenever there was an actual shortage in the United States and the oil was needed for domestic consumption.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator rather begs the question. If it is our intention through the Secretary of the Interior not to allow this foreign corporation to enjoy the products of their toil, why not say so now, because there is an actual shortage of oil, which will probably grow to a greater shortage, and we will be in the business of interfering with this foreign corporation through the Secretary of the Interior and taking the oil which they have mined. I think it would be much more businesslike, certainly far more simple, less irritating, to act now in accordance with the practice of the world. The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] spoke altruistically of our duty as brethren. There is a great deal of that going on just now, but while we are showing that altruistic spirit, other countries are taking advantage of our good nature—in Canada, for instance.

The question was put to Mr. Manning, of the Bureau of Mines, and his answer with respect to Canada is as follows:

Article 40 of the Canadian regulations for the disposal of petroleum and natural gas rights, the property of the Crown, in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, the Northwest Territories, etc., provides:

"Any company acquiring by assignment or otherwise a lease under the provisions of these regulations shall at all times be and remain a British company, registered in Great Britain or Canada, and having its principal place of business within His Majesty's dominions, and the chairman of the said company and a majority of the directors shall at all times be British subjects, and the company shall not at any time be or become directly or indirectly controlled by foreigners or by a foreign corporation."

Says Mr. Manning:

Since these regulations are in agreement with what appears to be the Imperial policy, it is probable that similar regulations will be found to exist in other British possessions, were complete and up-to-date information available.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator one question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield for a question.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator's position, it is that he would forbid the nationals of any country from acquiring any mineral lands, particularly oil lands, in the United States?

Mr. PHELAN. We are discussing oil now.

Mr. KING. Would the Senator prevent the nationals of other countries from acquiring any property, real or personal, in the United States?

Mr. PHELAN. I would not as a general proposition, except in certain specified cases where there is an extreme objection, which has been expressed in the California alien land laws.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator believe that it makes to the advantage and prosperity of America for American citizens to acquire property in other lands?

Mr. PHELAN. I think not.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator would welcome a law by Germany, France, Russia, England, and the nations of the earth forbidding Americans from entering those lands, or at least from acquiring property in those lands?

Mr. PHELAN. No; the Senator can not construe my answer as involving anything of the kind. I am in favor of a world commerce, and I am pleading now in favor of the American Government protecting its nationals wherever they may go. But I find on examining the record that our nationals are barred from all these countries, and I do not see the sense nor the reason in opening our domain to these same foreigners. That is what we are doing.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield.

Mr. FALL. Is there provision there that no American shall own an interest or stock in such Canadian company?

Mr. PHELAN. I will finish the reading. I was trying to abbreviate it. The rest of the law is as follows:

If the company which may acquire a location under these regulations shall at any time cease to be a British company or shall become a corporation under foreign control—

That is, American—or shall assign any of the rights acquired under the lease without the consent in writing of the minister being first had and obtained, the lease shall be subject to immediate cancellation in the discretion of the minister. (Canadian order in council, Jan. 19, 1914.)

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator know that the Imperial Oil Co. is controlled through stock owned by the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, which has refineries and marketing stations all over Canada and dominates the markets of the Dominion to-day?

Mr. PHELAN. I suppose they must have the permit of the minister, if that is true. I do not know as a fact that they have such power.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator it is a fact, and not only that but I think the price of oil is controlled in Canada through the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey more completely than in the United States.

Mr. PHELAN. Events are moving very rapidly. Mr. Manning says:

It has been reported of the Dutch-Shell—

That is the English company—

It has been reported that the Dutch-Shell has made an application to the Canadian Government for a 250-mile oil and gas concession in western Canada and that the application has been supported by the British Government.

So, ultimately, I suppose, if the Standard Oil is there it will be driven out.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator does not desire to be interrupted in the reading of this report now, of course I will wait until its conclusion, but I think, with a word or two, the Senator can understand the question.

Mr. PHELAN. I have no objection to the interruption.

Mr. FALL. In Canada the corporations which he speaks of are organized not under such rules and regulations as we have here, by which a few of us meet in a back room and agree that we form a corporation for building a railroad, and so forth, and proceed to build a railroad; but under the railroad laws of the Dominion of Canada as well as the laws of Latin America, as we are now referring to all countries, probably Mr. Manning, not being familiar with them, does not understand that the companies organized in Canada operate under a franchise granted by the Canadian Government or the Dominion as it may be; that any corporation organized in Mexico with a franchise—or, as it is ordinarily called, a concession—must have such franchise or concession from the General Government of Mexico through its Congress, and they have provided restrictions with reference to it. Therefore, in operating in foreign countries, American citizens, such as the Standard Oil Co., organize a Canadian company and the American company is the holding company. What they are prohibiting over there is the organization of an operating company of foreigners without special permits. That is prohibited by all countries except ours, because, instead of adopting the old incorporation system such as Great Britain remodeled hers upon in 1837, we allowed each one of our individual States to pass its own law. The consequence is, as the Senator of course knows, that we get together in a back room and organize what we call a corporation, and we take over the powers of eminent domain under the general law, while in these other countries they do not allow a thing of that kind to be done, but the corporation must be organized in a certain way provided by the General Government; that is, if it operates or holds any interest in the necessaries of life. To-day in Great Britain you can not organize such a railroad company as we have here. You can not organize a railroad company in Canada to-day as we organize it here. You must have an act of the Canadian Parliament, and therefore you must be a citizen of Canada. Mr. Manning is not familiar with the law. They have a perfect right to provide these restrictions. They do not preclude the Standard Oil Co. or any other company from holding every dollar of stock in that Canadian company.

Mr. PHELAN. The United States, therefore, is at a disadvantage in acting in its Federal capacity.

Mr. FALL. Yes, sir; I think that is the great trouble. The difficulty right now in dealing with our railroad and other great transportation problems in the United States is that we have 48 States and that our railroad companies are organized under their laws. In Great Britain the Parliament can read into the articles of incorporation of any railroad company organized or operating in Great Britain anything that it chooses to read into its articles of incorporation, and therefore it can always control them. In the United States we can not do so.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the very interesting exposition of the law by the Senator from New Mexico, I think, only fortifies what I have said. The Federal Government ordinarily is not in the position to act, for under the laws of the States, as provided in the Constitution, corporations may be formed, and there is no uniform incorporation law. These foreign governments, however, have a uniform law. They do not always wait for an act of Parliament; they have orders in council. Hence it is very easy to disqualify the Americans, and I am simply showing that in all these countries they have been disqualified from holding oil property. Because it is more difficult for us to apply the same rules to the foreigner, it is no reason why we should not act when we clearly have the power in this leasing bill affecting the public domain.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, of course the Senator from California and myself are both from the West; we have been familiar with the development of our resources, and are familiar with the necessity for the development of our resources. We have a mutual interest in subjects of this character. This is the first time that the General Government of the United States, since 1836, has sought to retain our interest in and control over property of this kind. It is abandoning the theory of granting the fee to individuals that it adopted in 1836. It is now holding the fee in itself and providing restrictions under which the property itself may be employed by individuals for the development of our western country.

In doing so it is distinguishing between the individual American and the alien; it is providing that as to the alien he can invest his capital, but the United States Government—through the President of the United States in one instance and through the Secretary of the Interior in the other—has the absolute authority to say how the product of the investment of that capital may be used, and that it shall be used first for the benefit of the people of the United States; and yet we allow aliens to invest their capital here.

If the Senator will permit me—for I am on the committee, in the first place, and then I have had something to do with this amendment—the purpose of the wording of the amendment is that we may not antagonize other countries in which American citizens are deeply interested. There is nothing here which will antagonize the Republic of Colombia, the Republic of Mexico, or any other country on this continent where oil deposits may be found. There is nothing here which would justify them in taking any action against the nationals of the United States going to their territories and developing properties unless they take it along this line; and they are perfectly justified in retaining to themselves the power to provide that the product of their own soil may be used first for the development of their own country. That is what we are doing now. There is nothing which would justify them in legislating against a citizen of the United States. If they legislate along the same line we shall welcome it, and have no objection whatsoever to their doing so. We hope that in this character of legislation we may assist in leading them into legislation to which all the world can agree and still show them that we have no desire to infringe in any way whatsoever upon their sovereign rights as sovereign States. This provision has been, I may say, drawn with some care for the very purpose of obviating these difficulties.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the nationals of the smaller countries in South America, where there are possible oil fields, have no desire whatever to enter into competition with our own people in the acquisition of oil fields upon the public domain.

Mr. FALL. That is true; but there are some things that we can not talk very frankly about now, because there are certain negotiations pending. If, however, the great nation of which the Senator has spoken is desirous of acquiring a monopoly of the oil of the world and through legislation adopted by the Congress of the United States sees an opportunity to monopolize the oil fields of other countries by leading such other countries to believe that the United States is legislating against them and their citizens, the object of the great country of which the Senator speaks may be well achieved, while if we give them no such opportunity whatever by enacting this general legislation, we can then take care of ourselves. If we set the example, Mexico or some other country will take advantage of it, possibly at the instigation of the very country to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, we do not seem to be acting like grown men in this matter. In treating with these South American countries we are disposed to regard them as children, and very often they become resentful without adequate cause.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from California certainly will not undertake to place in my mouth any such expression. I think that the South American countries, whether large or small, are sovereign countries, with the same rights that this country has, great as it is; and it has been very often characterized as "the Colossus of the North," because of just such expressions as have issued from the mouth of the Senator from California. There is no man in the Senate, I am sure, that would for one moment insinuate that the smallest country on this continent or on this hemisphere has not exactly the same sovereign rights of legislation that this country has. My sole desire is to show to those countries that we welcome them as we hope they will welcome us; that we discriminate not at all against them; that we reserve to ourselves the right to protect our own natural resources, and that they, following the same line of legislation, have exactly the same power to reserve to themselves the same right.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I do not dispute for a moment that every independent country is sovereign and has a right to dispose of its natural resources as it sees fit, but we must deal with practical questions in a practical way. They are giving concessions, as I demonstrated earlier in the day by reading from the official reports, to the nationals of other countries. I have before me the case of India, which reads like this:

American oil companies are expressly excluded from doing business in Burma, and a blanket concession for 99 years was given the Burma Oil Co. (Ltd.) in 1889, protecting this company from all foreign competition.

In South America exploitation is now going on by the Royal Dutch Shell and by the British Oil Fields (Ltd.). It is probably a race between American oil men and those representing other countries to get concessions. The only fear is that if we enact this law, like Britain, for instance, giving to our citizens in our own country the exclusive right of developing our own public domain, these petulant countries will say, "there is discrimination; we are not permitted to enter the United States, and, therefore, we shall deny the nationals of the United States the right to enter our country"; whereas, as a matter of fact, there is no national of any South American or Central American State who is desirous of coming into this field or any other field. They are not, as Americans and Englishmen and Frenchmen, enterprising pioneers in the development of oil or minerals. They have left to foreign nationals the development of their countries, and it has brought wealth to them. There is no reason why we should grant this privilege to foreigners because in the earlier days of the Republic we sought foreigners for the reason that we required their money for the development of our land. Now, however, it seems all the money is in the United States; that the financial center has shifted from London to New York. So it is not a question of a need of foreign capital which induces us to give privileges to foreigners. There is no need whatever why we should do so while there is an imperative need for us to conserve our own resources.

I do not think the Senate is fully informed on the world movement in oil. It is the greatest thing that is now happening in the economic life of the world. Here is the first opportunity we have had to express ourselves with regard to the preservation of our public domain for our own nationals, something that all other countries are doing, and we hesitate to do it. I believe we should, through the States, go very much further, and, as we do not need foreign capital, deny to foreign corporations the right of acquiring the natural resources, the oils, and the minerals of this country. Ultimately that will come, and when the States individually act they will not be moved by considerations such as the Senator from New Mexico urged of offending the sus-ceptibilities of other nations. Self-preservation, commerce, and the national defense will be their guide.

I am opposed to the amendment because I believe, as originally reported, it better accomplishes its purpose, and it is a declaration of sound national policy which should at this juncture be made.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the pending amendment acted upon. I think the Senate is ready to vote upon it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I offer the amendment to the pending bill which I send to the desk, and ask that it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, that that amendment is agreed to, I desire on line 5, page 2, to strike out the words "as hereinafter provided."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is part of the committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Then if that is a part of the amendment, I will withdraw the suggestion.

Those are all of the committee amendments.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I reserve the right to ask for a separate vote in the Senate on the amendment that has just been adopted.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I have offered an amendment as a substitute for the entire bill which I should like to have stated.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that other amendments have been offered to the bill; and as the Senator's amendment is a substitute for the whole bill, the proper way to do will be to perfect the bill and then offer the Senator's amendment as a substitute.

Mr. KIRBY. I have no objection to delaying it, although I think the amendment is in order at this time.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I move the amendments offered by me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments offered by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On pages 4 and 5, beginning on line 25, page 4, it is proposed to strike out the words "nor more than 20 cents."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, all of the amendments offered by me refer to two features of this bill. They seek first to reduce the term of leases, and secondly to strike out the maximum royalties provided for.

If apology be needed for the offer of amendments by a Senator who does not reside in a State where there are public lands, I may say that in my opinion this is one of the most important pieces of legislation that will be before this body at this session, because it is dealing with the last assets in lands and minerals that the people of the United States possess. Practically all their resources have gone into the hands of private individuals, and we have very few left. In my opinion there is not a Senator here who would for one moment be considering such a piece of legislation if it were not for the mistakes of previous Congresses in passing legislation dealing with the public lands that have left complications and have left difficulties which now require some action such as that proposed by this bill.

This bill deals with land, oil, coal, phosphate, sodium, the very foundations of the prosperity of this country, and the very source, I might say, of civilization in this country. So we are dealing with some very, very valuable resources; and I must confess that I have very serious doubts as to whether I can support the bill at all, because unless the situation is more serious than has been pictured to me—namely, the complications that have arisen through past acts of Congress—I do not think we want to go so far as to pass this bill. In any event, however, I am seeking by these amendments to perfect the bill as far as possible, and to keep these properties still within the reach and grasp of the people of our country.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I suppose the Senator recognizes that these lands which have not been prospected have no value now. Does not the Senator realize that there must be some inducement offered which will cause these lands to be explored and their value demonstrated? At the present time the lands have no value, and it is the merest chance if oil or gas is found in these lands. Does not the Senator believe that some very substantial inducement should be held out to the people of the country which would warrant their prospecting?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I can understand that an argument might well be made in that direction. I also can understand that the history of our country has shown that lands and minerals and oil wells are constantly and steadily increasing in value, and we owe something to future generations not to destroy all the properties that are left in the possesssion of the Government, or at least not to allow them to pass out of our hands.

I personally think we have reached a stage in our public affairs where the development of public lands and public properties should be done solely and alone by the Government. We have seen the mistake and the failure of private enterprise; and it is my opinion that if we pass this bill, and give the encouragement desired, it will not be very long before all of these remaining resources are in the possession of the few, although very careful efforts have been made—and I commend the committee for it—to prevent that occurring in this manner. I have been informed on reliable authority, however, that the prospecting that has been done in the past, that has been encouraged by the Government, has led invariably to all the properties getting into the hands of a few big interests in this country who control these resources.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator certainly does not mean to contend, does he, that the liberal policy pursued by the Government with respect to the disposal of its public domain and with respect to the acquisition by private individuals of mineral lands has been unwise and has resulted disadvantageously to the Government? Take the great States of Wisconsin and Minnesota, the Dakotas, Montana, and the States in the West, including those of the Pacific coast. They were built up by the adventuresome sons of the East, who sought new fields for the development of their genius and strength. The great empire west of the Mississippi was regarded as of but little worth. Webster opposed any expenditures being made by the Government in surveys or exploration, and delivered the entire territory over to predatory animals and nomadic Indians. But the brave men and women of the East went into the sterile wilderness and the mountain fastnesses. They contended with the Indians, with nature in her most savage form, and they built up great Commonwealths that have contributed to the greatness and glory of this Nation. The heroic Argonauts, with rare courage and in the face of privations and almost insurmountable obstacles, subdued the soil, made the deserts blossom as the rose, and gave to the Nation millions of agricultural and mineral wealth. The mountains yielded up their treasures when struck by their giant hands and poured priceless treasures into the channels and arteries of trade and commerce. The people of Massachusetts and New York and the East received the benefit of the toil and labor and struggles of the people of the West.

I submit that the policy of the Government in dealing with its public lands aided the establishment of these commonwealths and contributed to the material enrichment of this Nation. If I understand the views of my distinguished friend from Massachusetts I submit with all kindness they are not the comprehensive ones possessed by the statesmen of the past in dealing with the public lands, and if they had been adopted in the beginning of our history and persisted in during the past life of this Republic its progress would have been arrested and its history greatly different. The error is made in assuming that those who settle upon the public lands and open the mines of our land receive the only benefit. With the reclamation of deserts and the building of towns and cities, wealth is created which becomes a part of the Nation's wealth and adds to the patrimony of all. The gold and silver taken from the hills is added to the circulation medium of the land. The miners profit from the working of the mines; the manufacturer and merchant and farmer are benefited, and the circle of advantages is widened until it embraces the entire land.

The leasing system has always proven a failure. It has its birth under tyrannous governments, and has been abandoned as liberty has increased. Governmental landlordism is a wrong system; it is an anachronism. We turn our faces to the past, not to the future, when we fasten it upon this Nation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am pleased to hear a Senator from a western State commend the method that I have often heard condemned, of eastern capitalists going into the West and developing the resources of the West and spending their money in the East. If the western Senators have not any objection to that, I certainly have not.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment for a suggestion along that line?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I certainly will.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will go back a little in the history of the public lands he will find that the people who went West prior to 1837 bought and paid for lands, and that in that year, 1837, there were $24,000,000 of the proceeds of public-land sales in the Treasury of the United States, placed there by Andrew Jackson when the Bank of the United States was done away with. Upon the invitation of President Jackson various States of the Union applied for portions of this $24,000,000 to be deposited with them. The great State of Massachusetts secured a deposit of $4,000,000 and more out of the proceeds of public-land sales and never has returned a cent of the money nor paid a dollar of interest on it, and has it yet, derived from the public-land sales of the Far West.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if the public lands of this country did not come from the taxes of all the people of this country?

Mr. FALL. No, sir.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Were they not acquired either through war or purchase by annexation, and were not the expenses of the wars and the purchase price paid by all the people of all the States?

Mr. FALL. Oh, no; not at all. The Senator is entirely wrong historically.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Was it in part paid in such manner?

Mr. FALL. It was in part paid.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then the Senator will agree that the States that had contributed their portion had a right to a return?

Mr. FALL. Yes; and if I had the eloquence of the Senator's predecessor, Daniel Webster, he would never again raise his voice in this chamber in advocating such a public-land policy as he is now advocating. While Daniel Webster maintained with all his eloquence that the public lands belonged to the people of the United States, and fastened that policy upon this country, he yet realized that those of us who were going West, building up this country, and continuing to expand it to the Pacific Ocean, had some rights; that while the public lands belonged to the people of the United States, and while the proceeds of those lands should be enjoyed by all the people of the United States in the handling of the lands and of the natural possessions of the United States, they should be so handled as to build up the individual States in which they were located. In his answer to Hayne, if the Senator will permit me further——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator claim that I have advocated a different policy?

Mr. FALL. I think so.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Because I have asked to cut down the lease from 20 years to 5—because I have asked that the maximum royalty of 20 per cent be cut out, so that the maximum royalty can be 25 or 30 or 40 per cent, if these oil fields are so rich that they produce that?

Mr. FALL. I do not mean to say that the Senator has intended to do so, but I say that the Senator is now talking as though he would do so; that the speech which the Senator made is along that line.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have said that I would save to the people of this country every single natural resource that they have left; that too much of value has gone into the hands of private individuals.

Mr. FALL. Exactly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator agree to that doctrine?

Mr. FALL. Had that policy been pursued, I say you would have had yet the Great American Desert that you read of in the schoolbooks a few years ago.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the policy that has gone on has been all right, tell me why such a bill is here at all as a leasing bill.

Mr. FALL. I will tell the Senator very frankly that the people of the West who believe in building up the States never would have consented to such a bill had it not been provided that a portion of the proceeds of these royalties should go directly to the States, 45 per cent of it, because of the fact that you are taking away from them their sovereign power of taxation, through which they must sustain themselves as sovereign States on an equality with the State of Massachusetts. But in view of the fact that finally, after seven years' hard fight, we have engrafted in this proposed legislation the proposition that the States themselves shall be given a portion of the proceeds of the lease, we have agreed to it, and in that far we have followed the policy of the conservationists of the East.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield; yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the Senator from Massachusetts to get the impression, nor do I want the Senators who may hear the Senator from Massachusetts speak to get the impression, that in these great oil fields the royalties to be received from oil are limited to 20 per cent. There is no such provision in the bill as far as oil is concerned. There is a provision as far as coal is concerned that it shall be limited to 20 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. Why? Because everybody knows that every cent of royalty that is put upon coal will be paid by the consumer. Not so with oil. I do not want to take up any more of the time of the Senator now, but I will explain why when the Senator is through.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator from Utah whether the provision beginning at the top of page 16 does not relate to oil—"not less than 12½ per cent nor more than 25 per cent of all the oil or gas produced and saved"? Is not that a maximum limitation of the royalty?

Mr. SMOOT. That refers only to the men who have title to oil lands now and relinquish it to the Government; but in section 17 it is provided:

> That all unappropriated deposits of oil or gas situated within the known geologic structure of a producing oil or gas field and the unentered lands containing the same, not subject to preferential lease, may be leased by the Secretary of the Interior to the highest responsible bidder by competitive bidding under general regulations to qualified applicants in areas not exceeding 640 acres and in tracts which shall not exceed in length two and one-half times their width, such leases to be conditioned upon the payment by the lessee of such bonus as may be accepted and of such royalty as may be fixed in the lease, which shall not be less than 12½ per cent in amount of value of the production, and the payment in advance of a rental of not less than $1 per acre per annum thereafter during the continuance of the lease, the rental paid for any one year to be credited against the royalties as they accrue for that year.

There is a minimum there, but there is no maximum, I will say to the Senator, as far as the oil on the unappropriated lands of the United States is concerned; but section 18 applies to cases where a man is producing oil now on a nongeologic structure, and therefore he has to relinquish all of his rights to the Government of the United States, and takes a lease to it; and for that we thought he should not pay more than 25 per cent nor less than 12½ per cent.

Mr. THOMAS. He ought not to pay anything.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, many people believe that he ought not to pay anything, and technically that is correct; but I will say to the Senator that it would be impossible to secure the passage through Congress of a measure of that kind, and it is partially assuaged by the fact that the State gets 45 per cent of the money.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. There is one other case where a maximum royalty is provided—I know the Senator is familiar with it—and that is in the case of a prospecting permit, where he gets his one-fourth on a 5 per cent royalty as a reward.

Mr. SMOOT. That is section 14.

Mr. LENROOT. And then he is entitled to lease the remainder of the prospecting permit at a maximum of 25 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is in the case where the man goes out on the public domain, not outside of a nongeologic structure.

Mr. LENROOT. Field.

Mr. SMOOT. Field, not structure—a field, mind you—and he is a wildcatter, as he is called, and goes and takes every chance in the world to produce an oil well where even the Geological Department of our Government has not thought there could be oil produced, and therefore the land has not been withdrawn from entry. In that case, Mr. President, we have said that that man ought to have some extra privileges granted him. We do not say that to the man who receives a lease within a known geologic structure, but we do say it to the wildcatter, who perhaps runs a chance of one out of a thousand of ever striking a well. We say, "If, through your energy, you have developed in the United States here an oil well unknown to anybody in this country or anyone in the world, you are entitled first to 640 acres of that 2,560 acres at a 5 per cent royalty." Then we give him a preferential right upon the other three-quarters of that 2,560 acres at a royalty of not less than 12½ per cent or more than 25 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can not believe that the Senator from Massachusetts intends advisedly to contend that that is just or that the prospector ought to be required to pay more than 25 per cent on the oil that he finds. Nobody knows about the field; no department of the Government has any information that there is any oil there. If they had any information that there was oil there they would withdraw it, and it would become subject to the provisions of the existing law, but here is a region into which a man goes without the Government knowing anything about oil being there, and he takes his chances and discovers oil. He ought to have some reward for the energy and the enterprise that he displays. He occupies quite a different position from that of the man who takes a lease upon Government land which is known to contain oil.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is true. We have heard two eloquent pleas—one from the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the other from the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]—about the early frontiersmen of the West. When the Government gave them a grant it was a small one to the individual alone who went out there and by his strength and energy built up that section of the country. At that time he was the pioneer. This bill proposes to give not a few acres of land to an individual, but is leasing thousands of acres of valuable land, no man knows of what value, to individuals, to companies, to corporations who have to sell and resell the products of the people. I ask that the people who own these lands be protected and that the bill be so drafted that if the lands become valuable the Government can make a new lease as quickly as possible. I know from the nature of the bill that the provision for re-leasing is to renew the lease, which means that if the property is found to be more and more valuable at the end of 20 years the same lease at the same rates and on the same terms will be renewed, and no opportunity will be given to the Government to provide for a new lease upon new terms, based upon new values. "Renew the lease" is the language used in the bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have been thrown in personal contact recently with what private parties have been doing with regard to the development of oil lands, and I can say to the Senator from Massachusetts that parties in New Mexico have recently entered into contracts giving to a prospector not 2,560 acres upon a single lease for the drilling or sinking of a well, but that prospectors are demanding that they shall have as much as 5,000 acres, and in one case 200,000 acres of land, and that the terms upon which they are permitted to enter upon 200,000 acres of land were simply a royalty of 12½ per cent for a period of time as long as oil or gas should be produced. All the leases contain that provision. They contain the definite period, but also the indefinite period "as long as oil or gas shall be produced," and the royalty in every case is only 12½ per cent, and there is no arrangement made for an increase of the royalty. Those are the usual terms under which these lands are leased, and the acreage runs up into manifold the acreage permitted by this bill to the prospector upon public lands. The only fear that I have is that we will not be able to get prospectors to go upon the lands and drill the wells under the terms of the bill. They are not favorable enough.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to be accurate as to the provisions of the bill. In the case of renewal, the renewal is not upon the old terms and conditions. The renewal is upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may impose, and he may double the royalty.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In the language of this bill, I take the word "renewal" to be a renewal of the same lease.

Mr. LENROOT. The language of the bill is as follows:

> Leases shall be for a period of 20 years, with the preferential right in the lessee to renew the same for successive periods of 10 years upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is the original lease.

Mr. LENROOT. It is a renewal of the lease. Certainly it relates only to renewals—

> Unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such periods.

That applies only to renewals.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think it is a fair question as to the meaning of the word "renewals."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I think I can straighten out the situation. The Senator from Massachusetts doubtless has in mind the provision regarding the prospector, and the Senator from Wisconsin the lease on a known geologic structure. The provision which the Senator from Wisconsin just read is the latter part of section 17, which relates to leases upon known geologic structures. The Senator from Massachusetts has in mind the provision in the prospecting part of the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. I shall be glad if the Senator will point to a provision of the bill that provides for renewal upon the old terms and conditions.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Massachusetts in the discussion of this matter, being actuated I am sure by the very highest purposes, labors under a want of familiarity with the subject. He has adverted to the fact that heretofore the Government has disposed of its lands in tracts of very limited areas and, as he expressed it, the bill contemplates disposition to one individual or one corporation of thousands of acres. The lease is limited in each case to 2,560 acres, which is 4 sections.

Mr. LENROOT. Six hundred and forty acres, except in the case of prospecting for oil.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course; but I am speaking now about coal and phosphate. I think perhaps I am responsible for the provision in that respect, and I am quite willing to assume the entire responsibility for it.

I may say for the information of the Senator from Massachusetts that the first item dealt with in the bill is coal. Under the existing law one may enter 160 acres of coal land, or with a partner he may enter 320 acres, or any association may enter 320 acres. If $5,000 worth of work is done on that entry, the association may enter a section of land, which is 640 acres.

From the beginning it was found utterly impossible to develop the coal areas of the West upon any such limited area. No man could be induced to enter into the coal business upon such an area as the basis of his operations. I may say, in the first place, a plant is necessary, a tipple and other conveniences; that represents an expenditure of from $250,000 to $400,000, and no one was found in our shallow fields willing to go into the business of putting coal upon the market commercially upon any such area as was permitted to him under the act. The result was that the law was notoriously violated. Entries were made by what are known as dummy entrymen, and that practice went on for years. That is to say, one who desired to go into the coal business would secure a number of his neighbors and friends to make entries, which were to be immediately transferred to him, and thus he would acquire a block of land sufficient in area to justify him in making the expenditure necessary to carry on the work.

That was eventually determined, and very properly so, by the department and the courts to be in violation of the law and a crime. The consequence is that since it was so determined there have been no entries whatever of any consequence anywhere in the West on coal lands under the existing law, because nobody will go into the business on such an area. We were confronted with that situation of affairs.

So in the draft of the bill those who are responsible for it in its original form, as it took form some five or six years ago, concluded that it would be necessary to increase the area, and no one was heard to urge that anything less than 2,560 acres would justify any man of any business capacity whatever to undertake to establish himself in the coal-mining business. So far as the question of mines is concerned, I am entirely satisfied that it would be a fatal mistake to reduce that area by one acre. It can not be justified. If you do that, you may just as well not legislate upon the subject at all, because the very purpose of this act, in the first place, was to enable one, legitimately and lawfully and without having the penitentiary staring him in the face, to get an acreage of coal land which would justify the expenditure of the money necessary to establish the requisite plant.

Now, next comes the subject of oil. I must confess, sir, that I have no information nor had any of those associated in the original draft of the bill sufficient advice to form a good judgment as to how much ought to be embraced in an oil lease, and we adopted the same figure as that which I believe was just and right in the case of coal.

But following the matter up I learned that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs had been called upon to investigate this very subject, because he was charged and had been charged for years with the duty of making leases of Indian lands upon which it was believed oil existed, and he was called upon to establish a limit in his rules and regulations concerning the acreage that could be included in any lease of Indian lands. After an exhaustive inquiry upon the subject, he fixed 4,800 acres as the maximum limit, and all the Indian land leases are now executed upon that basis.

When those facts were revealed to me I came to entertain very grave doubts as to whether this is not altogether too small. You take an entirely unknown field and give a man a mere matter of two months within which he has the exclusive right of prospecting, and then after that it becomes subject to lease, and a lease can not be had for more than 640 acres of the 2,560 acres.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that there has been no report made by any Secretary of the Interior stating that 2,560 acres of oil land were too much. The present Secretary of the Interior says it is not too many acres in a lease and particularly so in issuing permits, to which the Senator has referred. I believe any Secretary of the Interior who made an investigation of the situation would think that 2,560 acres are too small an area, rather than one too excessive.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am afraid that is the situation so far as the oil lease is concerned. I am able to speak from personal knowledge on the subject of phosphates, and the limit in the case of phosphates can not be reduced without fatally wounding the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that in the case of phosphates we have a limit of 5,220 acres.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is all right.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, Senators who know how phosphates in Utah, Idaho, and Wyoming are located in blanket formation with no telling how thick or how thin they may be, have no question but that 5,220 acres are an area as little as anybody could possibly put up machinery to operate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think anybody who has given any attention to the subject will agree with the Senator from Utah. In order to put phosphate rock in commercial form so it can find market anywhere, it must be treated by an expensive process with sulphuric acid, and a very careful estimate is that it would cost something like $2,000,000 to put up a plant that will treat phosphate ore in such a way that it can be marketed.

It will be borne in mind that the market for this product is in the East, where agricultural cultivation goes on in an intensive way, and in Europe. We export phosphates in large quantities from Florida, South Carolina, and Tennessee, most of them finding their market in Germany, and we are obliged to transport the product over 2,500 miles of railroad before it finds a market. It is necessary to go into the business upon an enormously large scale in order to make it profitable at all. It is not a small man's proposition or a poor man's proposition in any sense of the word. You have got to make the lease large enough to justify the expenditure necessary to put the property in a commercial form.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I merely wish to say——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I have the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The floor is in the Senator's charge.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My little innocent amendments have caused a great deal of discussion. I should like to direct the attention of the Senate to the amendments I have proposed. I will yield to the Senator from Utah if he will discuss those amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. I was simply going to make a correction. I stated that for phosphates 5,220 acres are subject to lease. That is the amount that I included in the original bill, but the committee decided even in that case to cut it down to 2,560 acres, but it did provide for 5,220 acres of oil-shale land.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have no amendment dealing with acreage. I have an amendment which provides that municipal corporations taking leases of lands may have the same right to the same number of acres as private individuals or corporations. I can not conceive of any distinction being made when a municipal corporation asks the Government for a lease and why it should receive only one-eighth the amount of acreage that a private individual or a private corporation may receive. My amendment seeks to control the valuation of this property, and I do not know of any better argument or illustration that I can present to the Senate than what is taking place in America to-day. In the hands of five men are all the coal fields in the eastern part of the United States. When the consumers of New England, New York, New Jersey, and Maryland want to buy coal a group of men of five or more sit down and determine how much the people shall pay. That is what is happening to our natural resources. That is why I have asked for care and caution in the leasing of our natural resources, the value of which no man knows. That is admitted here by the advocates of the bill. Nobody knows what value shall come out of the properties which shall be leased under the bill. So, in order to guard and protect the public interest and the Government itself, I propose, first, that the term of a lease shall be cut down from 20 years to 5 years, and, secondly, that the maximum royalty shall be eliminated. In the previous bill the maximum royalty was not mentioned, only the minimum royalty, and I can not conceive why the Government should not be in a position to get all the value it possibly can out of these leases.

No man can tell how the value of these properties will change during the succeeding years. So I ask that the bill be amended by striking out the maximum royalty provided, and, secondly, by cutting down the term of the lease from 20 years to 5 years, in order that if these properties increase in value the Government can take advantage of the increase in value and meet the situation speedily and not have to wait for 20 years.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is evident that we can not dispose of the bill to-night, and therefore we shall have a session of the Senate to-morrow. Unless some Senator really desires to discuss the question, I shall move to adjourn.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I merely desire in this connection to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to the fact that it is only on the prospecting land that the maximum royalty for oil is fixed. After it is ascertained that the land is within a known geologic structure, then there is no maximum royalty fixed in the bill. It is left open to adjustment, and may go up to any amount; but the prospector, the man who finds the oil, must be assured of some return for the amount of money which he has ventured in the enterprise, so the prospector is entitled to hold one-fourth of the land at a royalty of 5 per cent, and the other three-fourths at a royalty not to exceed 25 per cent. As I stated before, my only fear is that the terms of the bill are not liberal enough to induce people to spend their money in such a venturesome enterprise.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before concluding the discussion this evening, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to an evident misapprehension that he has concerning section 8, under which municipal corporations are entitled to get each 320 acres of land. He contrasts that with the 2,560 acres for which a private individual may obtain a lease. Section 8 does not deal with the general subject of leasing at all, but provides—

> That in order to provide for the supply of strictly local domestic needs for fuel, the Secretary of the Interior may, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe in advance, issue limited licenses or permits to individuals or associations of individuals to prospect for, mine, and take for their use but not for sale, coal from the public lands without payment of royalty for the coal mined or the land occupied, on such conditions not inconsistent with this act as in his opinion will safeguard the public interest.

It is a concession made to the venturesome homesteader who goes out on the public domain and adjacent to his land upon the public domain finds a coal seam. He can go and take that coal without paying a dollar for it. The section proceeds:

> Provided, That this privilege shall not extend to any corporations.

Then:

> And provided further, That in the case of municipal corporations the Secretary of the Interior may issue such limited license or permit, for not to exceed 320 acres, upon condition that such municipal corporations will mine the coal therein under proper conditions and dispose of the same without profit.

That is to say, we make a present to the municipal corporation of a lease on the whole 320 acres. They do not pay a dollar, and all they have to agree to do is that they will sell it to the people who live in the town without any profit.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Upon what basis was it fixed at 360 acres?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that is twice the area that has ever been allowed in any of the previous bills. The Secretary of the Interior fixed 160 acres in the beginning, but the bill makes it twice that amount; it provides for 320 acres.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Why should a municipal corporation not have the same area as an individual or private corporation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will explain that to the Senator from Massachusetts. It is because a municipal corporation is not going into the business of selling coal everywhere all over the world where it can find a market for it. It is merely going to take out a small amount that is necessary for use right in its own town.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, why should they not be permitted to do that, I ask the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I know of no reason at all.

Mr. NUGENT. Why should not such a provision be included in the bill?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Simply because this is an out-and-out gift. If you want to give the municipality 2,560 acres, I am perfectly certain that none of us who are in any way responsible for this bill will offer the slightest objection. Bear in mind, we will be only too glad to accept the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts. If you want to give to our little towns and cities in the neighborhood in which there is a coal seam an opportunity to take coal from 2,560 acres of land, we will say "Thank you."

But I speak of this, Mr. President, to show that it is scarcely a just criticism of either the author of the bill or the Committee on Public Lands, which has given the matter such careful consideration. If the Senator from Massachusetts wants to give us 2,560 acres, why, of course, we shall be glad to take it.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to discuss the question when we reach it to-morrow, and I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will then express his opinion as to what it is best to do in the matter; but the members of the committee who are from the West—and, in fact, as I have said, nearly all of them are from the West—did not want the Senator from Massachusetts to believe that we were going to hog 2,560 acres of land for every city in the West that may happen to want it and pay no royalty to the Government for it. There are two sides to the question and to-morrow we shall discuss it.

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to ask a question. Are 320 acres allowed to the municipality in a field where the coal is already known to be?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly. A municipality can go out in almost any part of my State and immediately take 360 acres.

Mr. KIRBY. Where coal has already been discovered?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; where there is no more doubt that there is coal than there is that we are in this Chamber. They can go and pick it out. Again, in the case of an individual who lives 30 or 50 miles from a railroad and knows that immediately adjacent to his home there are millions of tons of coal, do you think that to-day he can take a shovelful of it? If he does, he violates the law. This bill gives him the right without royalty to take enough coal to keep his family warm during the winter.

Mr. KIRBY. Then the bill does not give a lease for 2,500 acres of already proven coal lands, does it?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is all proven coal land. There is no real danger of a man taking a lease upon any of the coal lands which have been withdrawn. There have been 47,300,000 acres of coal lands withdrawn. Talk about coal! The State of Utah has enough coal within her hills to furnish coal for the world for 300 years.

Mr. KIRBY. We also have coal in Arkansas, and that was the reason I could not see why it was proposed to give a man 2,500 acres of coal land.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not very much coal land.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, like the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], I have been opposed to maximum royalties, and I wish to explain why, as a member of the committee, I have consented to the maximum-royalty provision still remaining in the bill.

If the Senator will examine the bill as originally introduced, he will find that it provided maximum royalties for every lease, and the most strenuous contest in the committee was upon that question. Finally, all maximum royalties were stricken out and leases were subjected to bid and to be sold to the highest bidder except in three classes of cases. The first is as to coal; and the maximum royalty as to coal remains, because in the case of coal the royalty is directly reflected in the price to the consumer.

I desire to say very frankly that I would not in any case ask that the Government make money out of its national resources if the people as a whole could get the benefit of them, but where they can not get that benefit through the money that comes into the Treasury they ought to have the fullest benefit possible. In the case of coal the higher the royalty the higher the price per ton the people must pay who burn the coal. That is not true in the case of oil. We might give the oil away and the price of gasoline and oil would remain just the same, so far as the consumer is concerned. So the maximum royalties are stricken out of this bill so far as oil is concerned, except in the re-lease section and except in the case of the prospecting permit. Why does it remain in the re-lease section?

The Senator will notice that relinquishments are required to be made within six months after the passage of the act. Unless the claimant knows the maximum royalty he must pay, it is not to be supposed that it would be fair to ask him to relinquish his valuable claim; but he does know with a maximum royalty that he may be required to pay as much as one-quarter, which I may say is as high a royalty as I know of being paid, except I was told the other day of a 50 per cent royalty, I think, in the Salt Lake field.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KIRBY. Did I understand the Senator to say that the supply of oil has nothing whatever to do with the price of gasoline and oil?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I said the royalty upon oil. If we gave this oil away without any royalty the consumer would pay just as much for gasoline as if we charged a royalty. That is what I said.

Mr. KIRBY. Then I misunderstood the Senator. I understood the Senator to say that, regardless of the production of oil, the price of the oil produced would be the same.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I did not say that; I said that if there was no royalty coming into the Treasury we would pay just as much for gasoline, and therefore there is the strongest reason for a royalty for the fair value of what we are giving them. Therefore, in the case of reliquishments the maximum remains, so that in reliquishing the relinquisher will know that he will not be required to pay more than one-quarter, and in no case, of course, are the reliquishments subject to bidding.

The next and the only other case where a maximum royalty remains in the case of the prospecting permit, which has in it the element of reward to the prospector who goes entirely outside of a producing oil field, takes his chances, and spends perhaps hundred of thousands of dollars on a most hazardous kind of speculation. If he succeeds in getting oil and discovers a new producing field he ought to have a liberal reward, because the moment he does that every other acre of land in that geologic structure is subject to lease to the highest bidder, and the discovery that man makes of a new oil field is not only the source of a new and additional supply of oil to the people but affords revenue to the Government through the leases upon the other land that will be disposed of to the highest bidder. That was the reason that I, as a member of the committee, consented to the maximum-royalty provision remaining in the bill in the two particulars I have mentioned.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator explain how the fixing of a maximum royalty will ever control the price of anything to the consumer?

Mr. LENROOT. Speaking of coal, the maximum royalty is 20 cents. Suppose there were no maximum and the producer of the coal were willing to pay 50 cents or $1, the person who bought coal to last him through the winter would pay in the price of that coal the difference between 20 cents and $1; that is what I mean by it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Without competition or without any agency of the Government to control the price, the producer could sell the coal to the consumer at 50 or 100 per cent profit and only give the Government 20 cents.

Mr. LENROOT. I recognize that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then how, by fixing a maximum royalty, can the price of a commodity to the consumer be controlled without some agency of the Government to control the price?

Mr. LENROOT. The difference between oil and coal is that the producer of oil never sells to the consumer, either directly or indirectly. The oil has to go through other processes before any part of it is available to the consumer. That is not true in the case of coal. Coal only goes through one medium from the mine to the consumer, and perhaps none, for the retailer may be an agent of the coal producer. Then if, instead of 20 cents, there is $1 a ton imposed by way of royalty upon that coal, does not the Senator see that the consumer will be compelled to pay the difference of 80 cents per ton?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, if there is $1 fixed by way of royalty I can see how the consumer can be charged $3, $4, $5, or $10 for a ton of coal if there is no agency controlling the price.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So that the fixing of a maximum royalty does not control and can not control the price of anything.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see. Suppose there were a price-fixing agency, so that the producers could charge only a reasonable price. With such price-fixing does not the Senator see that if a dollar a ton royalty upon coal is charged instead of 20 cents the price-fixing body must permit a charge to the consumer of 80 cents per ton more than they would if the royalty were 20 cents?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I agree that a price-fixing body can control the price of coal, and such a body and not maximum royalties is the important consideration, for without price fixing and Government regulation maximum royalties do not amount to anything, except to prevent the Government from getting, in the case of an article of extremely great value, the highest figure it can. When there is a law which prevents the Government leasing beyond a certain price it keeps the Government from securing an adequate return in the case of extreme and excessive value. The values in this instance may never reach such proportions, but no one knows when they will come.

Mr. LENROOT. When the Senator recognizes the fact that a price-fixing body must take into consideration the amount of royalty, the Senator at once must see that the royalty is paid by the consumer.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But we have no price-fixing body provided for; we have only a maximum royalty fixed——

Mr. LENROOT. We have not in this bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Which you agree will not and of itself can not control the price to the consumer.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly not in this bill; but the Senator recognizes that that is a matter which each State may control for itself to a very large degree, and I apprehend, as I think the Senator from Massachusetts does, that the trend to-day is for price fixing of every commodity that is in any wise controlled by a monopoly or any organization that tends to monopoly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yet the Senator does not propose and would not vote for an amendment inserting a price-fixing clause in the oil and coal leasing provisions of this bill?

Mr. LENROOT. I certainly thought I explained quite clearly in the case of oil why it could not be done so that it would be of any benefit to the consumer, because oil as it comes from the well is not sold to the consumer.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then there is one commodity beyond price-fixing control in the Senator's opinion—oil?

Mr. LENROOT. So far as oil coming from the well is concerned, it certainly is.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, I submit to the Senator from Massachusetts that if he desires a price-fixing amendment be put in this bill, then he wants to limit the royalty, because if he does not limit the royalty under the price-fixing amendment a price could not be established; so that the two amendments could not stand. If you have a price-fixing amendment, then you should leave the royalty provision where it is; you certainly do not want the two.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Not necessarily.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is a new Member of this body and has not heard this question discussed. Twelve years ago there was no man in the United States who would claim that he wanted royalty to the utmost extent that he could possibly get it out of the resources of this country. All that was wanted was to regulate the mining of coal and the production of oil, and all that was asked at that time was sufficient royalty to pay the expenses of the Government. How often have we heard the late Senator from Nevada, Mr. Newlands, known in years past as the "father of conservation," stand upon this floor and state that he would not support a measure requiring greater royalties than enough to pay the Government the cost of administration. That was his theory; that was what we all thought in the first place; that is what was taught to us; but now the Senator from Massachusetts comes in and wants to get every dollar that he can squeeze out of the people of the West who have to purchase coal.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if it is not a fact that the conferees in the last Congress took the position which I now take, that there should be no maximum royalties.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that may be; at the last session of Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And I should like to ask the Senator, as my position is a new one, because I am a new Senator, if he has not pretty persistently and continuously in past Congresses opposed the leasing of public lands in bills of a somewhat similar character.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator had been in the Chamber yesterday he would have heard the Senator's position, because I frankly stated it. I do not hesitate a minute to say that I think the leasing system is not the best system to develop the resources of this country. There is no question about it, and yesterday I told the reasons why. I do not want to take the time now to go over that same ground.

Mr. President, it is evident that we can not dispose of any more amendments this evening.

THE WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a few days ago the Committee on Foreign Relations had a conference at the White House with the President, at which conference the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] submitted a number of question to which the President was asked to reply. The Senator from New Mexico this morning called attention to a few of the questions and to one of the replies. In view of the fact that the former part of the interview has gone into the RECORD, I ask that all the questions and the replies thereto be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. If I am not mistaken, that matter has already been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KING. I was advised that that had not been done. If so, of course, I shall withdraw the request.

Mr. SMOOT. If it has already been printed I should not want it to be again printed, but if it has not been printed I shall have no objection to its being printed.

Mr. KING. Certainly.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"QUESTIONS ASKED BY SENATOR FALL AND REPLIES BY PRESIDENT WILSON.

"Senator FALL's questions given to President Wilson follow:

"1. In your judgment, have you not the power and authority, by a proclamation, to declare in appropriate words that peace exists and thus restore the status of peace between the Governments and peoples of this country and those with whom we declared war?

"2. Could not, in any event, the power which declared war—that is, Congress, joined by the President, as you affixed your approval of the declaration of war, by a resolution, or act of Congress—declare peace, as Germany did not declare war upon us?

"3. Is not the pending treaty, aside from the league covenant, merely a set of agreed rules and regulations to be observed after peace is established, and is not the state of war terminated merely by the filing of the first process verbal?

"4. The state of war being thus terminated by the filing of the process verbal, although we may not yet have ratified the treaty, Germany not having declared war upon us, could you not appoint or reappoint consular officers and agents in Germany, and by a proclamation of the status of peace authorize our citizens and without further delay resume governmental relations with Germany, and would we not then be off of a war basis as to business?

"ESTABLISHMENT OF THE LEAGUE.

"5. The agreement of the signatories to the treaty is that 'from the coming into force of the present treaty the state of war will terminate.'

"And under article 440 it is provided that as soon as the treaty shall have been ratified by Germany on the one hand and by three of the principal allied and associated powers on the other hand the first procès verbal of the deposit of ratification will be drawn, and 'from the date of this first procès verbal the treaty will come into force between the high contracting parties who have ratified it.'

"Am I correct in assuming:

"(a) That when three of the principal allied powers shall have ratified the treaty with Germany and the procès verbal is filed the league of nations is then established?

"(b) That all the other provisions of the treaty with Germany are in full force to such ratifying powers?

"(c) That as to the two remaining powers, should they not have ratified it (the one being the associated power, the United States), 'the state of war will terminate,' although the particular terms of the treaty itself will not be in force as to such nonratifying powers?

"(d) That such last powers will not be members of the league until and unless thereafter they have either ratified the treaty and the league articles or shall have been otherwise accepted into the league under the provisions of the league articles as they now stand or as they may be in force at the time of admission?

"6. However desirable it might be to have the treaty immediately adopted with the articles of the covenant of the league as written, by what process will this, in view of your statement as to largely increased export within the near future or within one or two more years, reduce in this country the rentals, cost of necessaries, etc.?

"LICENSES FOR EVERY TRADE.

"7. Have you heard from Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, and Switzerland, or either, as to whether they will join the league, and when?

"8. Are you issuing, or allowing to be issued, en bloc or otherwise, licenses to do business with those recently our enemies, and are you allowing ships and cargoes destined to ports of Germany or other recent enemy ports to clear from our ports?

"9. Have you requested consular representatives of other countries to act for us in Germany?

"10. Among the documents forwarded on the 8th instant to the chairman of the committee, by yourself, under No. 6, following the final report of the commission upon the league articles, I find the following recommendation: 'Resolved, That in the opinion of the commission the president of the commission should be requested by the conference to invite seven powers, including two neutrals, to name representatives on a committee (a) to prepare plans for the organization of the league; (b) to prepare plans for the establishment of the seat of the league; (c) to prepare plans and the agenda for the first meeting of the assembly.'

"Was this committee appointed, and have they reported tentatively to the commission or to yourself, and, if so, is a copy of such report available?

"QUESTIONS AS TO TERRITORY.

"11. Under article 18, of the peace treaty, Part IV, there is a general renunciation of all German rights to territory formerly belonging to herself or to her allies and a renunciation of all her rights, titles, and privileges outside of her boundaries as fixed by the treaty which she held as against the allied and associated powers. There is no cession, apparently, of the territory to any particular power or association of powers, but there is an understanding on the part of Germany to recognize and conform to the measures which may be taken 'now, or in the future by the principal allied and associated powers in agreement, where necessary, with third powers in order to carry the above stipulation into effect.'

"To what nation or nations or association of nations does the territory renounced under this article go, aside from such portions as are specifically assigned to certain nations or plebiscite commissions by the particular article of the German treaty, and by what character of title and what part, if any, does the United States take or has she taken with reference to the disposition of such property?

"12. Article 119, section 1, of Part IV, reads:

"'Germany renounces in favor of the principal allied and associated powers all her rights and titles over her overseas possessions.'

"This appears to be a direct cession of the German overseas possessions to the principal allied and associated powers; of course, the United States being an associated power, what character of title does the United States receive to any part of the overseas possessions ceded by Germany through article 119?

"SAAR BASIN'S DISPOSITION.

"13. Has there as yet been any agreement, tentative or otherwise, as to the disposition or the government of such overseas possessions or any part of same to which the United States is a party?

"14. Will you inform the committee whether, through an agreement between France and Great Britain, any disposition or agreement for the disposition of all or any part of the German overseas possessions in Africa has been arrived at; and if so, whether the United States has, tentatively or otherwise, consented thereto, and whether possession has been taken by either France or Great Britain of any such German territory by any such agreement or tentative agreement?

"15. Was it or is it now contemplated that, of the commission composed of five members to be chosen by the council of the league of nations for the government of the Saar Basin, one of said commission to be a citizen of France, one a native of the Saar Basin and not a native of France, and the three other members belonging to three countries other than France or Germany, there should be one American commissioner among the membership of five; and if so, why is it necessary that America should be represented upon this commission?

"16. Why should the United States be represented by one member of the commission for the settling of the new frontier lines of Belgium and Germany under articles under sections 34 and 35?

"17. As article 48 of the treaty provides for a boundary commission for the Saar Basin, to be composed of five members, one to be appointed directly by France and one directly by Germany, why was it not provided that the other three be nationals of other powers? Should each be named in the article to be appointed by some particular country, as is done with reference to the other two, rather than to leave the selection of such three to the council of the league of nations with the restrictive provisions that the said three should be selected from nationals of other powers than France and Germany?

"SETTLEMENT OF BOUNDARY DISPUTES.

"18. Why was it necessary to provide in article 83 that of the commission of seven members to fix the boundaries between Poland and the Czecho-Slovak state, one should be named by Poland, one by such Czecho-Slovak state, and the other five named by the five allied and associated powers, rather than that certain countries, specifically named, should nominate the five as well as the two?

"19. Has such commission been appointed, tentatively or otherwise, and has it proceeded to the performance of any of its duties, either in a temporary manner or otherwise?

"20. Why was it necessary to form a commission of four members, one to be designated by each the United States, France, the British Empire, and Italy, to exercise authority over the plebiscite area of Upper Silesia; that is to say, why was it necessary to name the United States as one of the powers which should appoint one of the four commissioners and then leave the decision of such commission to a majority vote?"

President Wilson's reply to Senator FALL's questions was as follows:

"MY DEAR SENATOR FALL: You left yesterday in my hands certain written questions which I promised you I would answer. I am hastening to fulfill that promise.

"I feel constrained to say in reply to your first question not only that in my judgment I have not the power by proclamation to declare that peace exists, but that I could in no circumstances consent to take such a course prior to the ratification of a formal treaty of peace.

"I feel it due to perfect frankness to say that it would, in my opinion, put a stain upon our national honor which we never could efface, if after sending our men to the battlefield to fight the common cause, we should abandon our associates in the war in the settlement of the terms of peace and dissociate ourselves from all responsibility with regard to those terms.

"I respectfully suggest that, having said this, I have in effect answered also your second, third, and fourth questions, so far as I myself am concerned.

"Permit me to answer your fifth question by saying that the provisions of the treaty to which you refer operate merely to establish peace between the powers ratifying, and that it is questionable whether it can be said that the league of nations is in any true sense created by the association of only three of the allied and associated governments.

"WOULD REDUCE COST OF LIVING.

"In reply to your sixth question, I can only express the confident opinion that the immediate adoption of the treaty, along with the articles of the covenant of the league as written, would certainly within the near future reduce the cost of living in this country as elsewhere, by restoring production and commerce to their normal strength and freedom.

"For your convenience, I will number the remaining paragraphs of this letter as the questions to which they are intended to reply are numbered.

"7. I have had no official information as to whether Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, or Switzerland will join the league.

"8. I answered your eighth question in reply to a question asked me at our conference the other day.

"9. In February, 1917, Spain was requested to take charge of American interests in Germany through her diplomatic and consular representatives, and no other arrangement has since been made.

"10. The committee to prepare plans for the organization of the league, for the establishment of the seat of the league, and for the procedure of the first meeting of the assembly has been appointed, but has not reported.

"11. Article 118 of the peace treaty, Part IV, under which Germany renounces all her rights to territory formerly belonging to herself or to her allies, was understood, so far as special provision was not made in the treaty itself for its disposition, as constituting the principal allied and associated powers the authority by which such disposition should ultimately be determined. It conveys no title to those powers, but merely intrusts the disposition of the territory in question to their decision.

"TRUSTEESHIP FOR COLONIES.

"12. Germany's renunciation in favor of the principal allied and associated powers of her rights and titles to her overseas possessions is meant similarly to operate as vesting in these powers a trusteeship with respect of their final disposition and government.

"13. There has been a provisional agreement as to the disposition of these overseas possessions, whose confirmation and execution is dependent upon the approval of the league of nations, and the United States is a party to that provisional agreement.

"14. The only agreement between France and Great Britain with regard to African territory, of which I am cognizant concerns the redisposition of rights already possessed by those countries on that continent. The provisional agreement referred to in the preceding paragraph covers all the German overseas possessions in Africa as well as elsewhere.

"15. No mention was made in connection with the settlement of the Saar Basin of the service of an American member of the commission of five to be set up there.

"16. It was deemed wise that the United States should be represented by one member of the commission for settling the new frontier lines of Belgium and Germany, because of the universal opinion that America's representative would add to the commission a useful element of entirely disinterested judgment.

"SAAR BASIN UNDER LEAGUE.

"17. The choice of the commission for the Saar Basin was left to the council of the league of nations, because the Saar Basin is for 15 years to be directly under the care and direction of the league of nations.

"18. Article 83 does, in effect, provide that five of the members of the commission of seven to fix the boundaries between Poland and Czechoslovakia should be nominated by certain countries, because there are five principal allied and associated powers, and the nomination of five representatives by those powers necessarily means the nomination of one representative by each of those powers.

"19. No such commission has yet been appointed.

"20. It was deemed wise that the United States should have a representative on the commission set up to exercise authority over the plebiscite of Upper Silesia for the same reason that I have given with regard to the commission for settling the frontier line of Belgium and Germany.

"Sincerely, yours,

"WOODROW WILSON."

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, August 23, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 22, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite and eternal Spirit, Father of all our longings, fondest hopes, and purest aspirations, let the blessing of heaven descend copiously upon us, to clarify our minds, quicken our conscience, and lead on to noble deeds; that these, Thy servants, the Representatives of a great people, may meet the stupendous problems which confront them and solve them to our good and the good of all peoples. In the spirit of the Lord Christ. Amen.

ASCERTAINMENT OF A QUORUM.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Yesterday I understood the Chair to rule that it was improper for a Member in making the point of no quorum to state any reason whatever therefor. In that connection I would like to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that there are frequently times when the membership of the House are perfectly willing to transact business without a quorum——

The SPEAKER. Well, the gentleman——

Mr. BLANTON. I am making this statement preliminary to my parliamentary inquiry. At other times situations arise when some Member, within his judgment, deems a quorum necessary——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it is not proper——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's point is well taken.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the Chair——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I make the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Are there no occasions when a Member may state his reasons for asking for a quorum?

The SPEAKER. There are not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There is no occasion when this House can do business without a quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Kansas certainly will not deny that of late it has been an awfully hard matter to keep a quorum here, and we ought to have one right now.

Mr. REAVIS. Is it in order to make the point of no quorum before the Journal is read?

The SPEAKER. Yes; any Member can at any time make the point of no quorum if he so desires.

Mr. BLANTON. I think we ought to have a quorum, and I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. GARNER. I suggest to the gentleman from Wyoming that he move a call of the House.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ackerman	Flood	Kiess	Riordan
Anthony	Foster	Larsen	Rose
Bankhead	Frear	Lea, Calif.	Rouse

Fitzgerald	Kettner	Riddick

The SPEAKER. On this call 297 Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. REAVIS. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from six postal employees on matters pertaining to the service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from certain postal employees relative to that service. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have never yet objected to the extension of remarks when any colleague requested the privilege, and probably will not object now, but yesterday the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY], who is next to the ranking Democratic Members on the great Ways and Means Committee, meekly asked for five minutes to protest against the adoption of a monopolistic measure, upon which he had not been permitted to speak, but there was objection on the Republican side, and his voice in behalf of the people was thus silenced——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. If I can make a short statement, I shall not object, but if prevented by the gentleman from Kansas insisting on the regular order I shall object, merely to register a mild protest against such unfair Republican gagging, but will not object later on, when the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] renews his request.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will permit me to conclude my short statement, I will not object.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

PENSIONS.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this being the day on which private pension bills are in order, I call up H. R. 8536, granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER], chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, calls up the omnibus pension bill, H. R. 8536, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Mary Ann Ellis, former widow of Lewis Ellis, late of Company C, Sixth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $35 per month.

The name of Abner D. Rutherford, late of Company F, Sixth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Cora Mitchell, widow of Levi Mitchell, late of Company A, Fifty-eighth Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The name of George W. Snider, late of Company F, Thirty-first Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of John Bonhome, late of Company B, Fourteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Abraham A. Randles, late of Company G, One hundred and ninety-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Jacob Fishel, late of Company K, Ninety-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of George Dettmer, late of Company K, Fifteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Robert T. Jellison, late of Company I, Thirteenth Regiment Kansas Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Katherine Hallbaugh, former widow of John Detrick, late of Company E, Ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The name of Sarah J. Mackin, widow of William A. Mackin, late of Company G, One hundred and ninety-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $35 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The name of Martha Gibson, widow of John H. Gibson, late of Company G, Thirty-seventh Regiment, and Company E, Fifty-fifth Regiment, Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The name of Harrison H. Riddle, late of Company I, Fifty-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Mary T. Barnard, widow of John Barnard, late of Company C, Fourth Regiment Arkansas Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The name of Mary Sullivan, widow of Cornelius Sullivan, late of Company L, Thirteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month.

The name of Anna E. Middleton, helpless child of James Middleton, late of Company H, Eighty-ninth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The name of Andrew F. Welfley, helpless child of John Welfley, late of Company C, One hundred and seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month.

By Mr. REED of New York:

Page 33, line 19, strike out the word "North" and insert the word "Horth." (Being the pension of Hadley Horth.)

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FULLER of Illinois, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MANN WHITE-SLAVE LAW.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, a few months ago the Federal grand jury for the southern district of Florida passed certain resolutions, a part of which is as follows:

Whereas during the session of the grand jury many cases of violation of the Mann white-slave law were considered; and

Whereas on the testimony produced before the grand jury it was apparent that the objects for which this law was passed are not being carried out, but that the said law is being used by unscrupulous men and women for blackmailing unsuspecting persons—

I shall not read all of the resolutions, but certain amendments are suggested. I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] who introduced the bill known as the Mann White-Slave Act has repeatedly stated that he never intended the courts to place the construction upon the law that has been placed upon it. I also understand that it was not the intention of Congress to have the law so construed.

It has been repeatedly charged that blackmailers are constantly using this law for their own gain. I have mailed a copy of these resolutions to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and I earnestly request careful consideration of the resolutions by that committee, and trust that it will report out a bill to make such blackmailing schemes in the future impossible.

AMENDMENT TO THE FOOD LAW.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 8624, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production and conserving the supply and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 8624. Is there objection?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 256.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 8624, being a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917. There shall be two hours of general debate, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE]. At the conclusion of general debate the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule, whereupon the bill shall be reported to the House with the amendments, if any, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this rule makes in order the consideration of the bill amending the food act, as suggested by the President when he addressed the House a few days ago. I understand the bill is reported from the Committee on Agriculture by unanimous report of the committee. There is immediate necessity for its consideration. The rule is fair, and provides a method by which the bill may be considered and passed during this legislative day. Unless there are requests for time, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Under the terms of the resolution the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the resolution be reported.

The SPEAKER. The resolution has been once reported and it has been adopted.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I did not understand that the resolution had been read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken. The resolution was read.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8624, with Mr. TEMPLE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, wearing apparel, containers primarily designed or intended for containing foods, feeds, or fertilizers, fuel, including fuel oil and natural gas, and fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients, tools, utensils, implements, machinery, and equipment required for the actual production of foods, feeds, and fuel, hereafter in this act called necessaries; to prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, manipulation, and private controls affecting such supply, distribution, and movement; and to establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war. For such purposes the instrumentalities, means, methods, powers, authorities, duties, obligations, and prohibitions hereinafter set forth are created, established, conferred, and prescribed. The President is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as are essential effectively to carry out the provisions of this act."

SEC. 2. That section 4 of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That it is hereby made unlawful for any person willfully to destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof; knowingly to commit waste or willfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in or in connection with their production, manufacture, or distribution; to hoard, as defined in section 6 of this act, any necessaries; to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any necessaries; to engage in any discriminatory and unfair, or any deceptive or wasteful practice or device, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries; to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person, (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict distribution of any necessaries; (d) to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof; or (e) to exact excessive prices for any necessaries, or to aid or abet the doing of any act made unlawful by this section. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, horticulturist, vineyardist, planter, ranchman, dairyman, stockman, or other agriculturist, with respect to the farm products produced or raised upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by him: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to forbid or make unlawful collective bargaining by any cooperative association or other association of farmers, dairymen, gardeners, or other producers of farm products with respect to the farm products produced or raised by its members upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by them."

SEC. 3. That sections 8 and 9 of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, That any offense committed in violation of said sections 8 and 9, prior to the passage of this act, may be prosecuted and the penalties prescribed therein enforced in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. HAUGEN Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG]. [Applause.]

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I shall vote for this bill as reported by the Committee on Agriculture, but in doing so I want to say most emphatically that I do not regard this legislation as necessary to enable our inactive and incompetent Department of Justice to do that which they have so flagrantly and persistently refused to do during the last six years [applause on the Republican side], and that is to make an honest effort to break up food profiteering in this country. I heard the address of the President delivered in this Chamber two weeks ago to-day, and in my judgment that address was in effect a plea of confession and avoidance. With far less skill and adroitness in the use of language than he usually employs, the President made a feeble effort to establish some sort of connection between the present high cost of living and a league of nations. Painfully, and it struck me rather laboriously, he tried to create the impression in the public mind that the American people could not expect any relief of a permanent nature from the present excessive prices on necessaries until the treaty of peace, embodying his Utopian conception of a league of nations, was ratified by the Senate. You know the President once said he had a single-track mind. The public was convinced long since that that admission is well founded. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] He has given us abundant evidence of the fact that he is incapable of seeing more than one thing at a time.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RODENBERG. I have got so many things; I am just beginning; I will give you something to worry about after a while.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Just one question.

Mr. RODENBERG. Very well.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I want to ask this question: The gentleman is a splendid speaker and he always makes a nice, pleasing address; but I would like to ask him why it is that he and all the Republicans, whenever they make a speech, attack the President? Why do you do that continually?

Mr. RODENBERG. Because there are times when he is deserving of attack. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. You always make him the subject of attack.

Mr. RODENBERG. For the past nine months the President's mind has been completely absorbed by this idea of a league of nations. He thinks of it all day and dreams of it all night. In fact, in my judgment, it has become a sort of obsession with him. If there were a famine in China, a drought in India, a flood in the Mississippi Valley, an earthquake in Porto Rico, a volcanic eruption in Central America, or an epidemic of spinal meningitis in New York City, the President, by a process of reasoning that satisfies himself, at least, convinces himself that the sole contributing cause is the failure to adopt the league of nations. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Why, my friends, you remember—I wonder whether the President remembers—this question of the high cost of living was an issue in this country long before any notion of a league of nations ever found a lodging place in the imagination of any dreamer or idealist of this country. If the President has forgotten that, I think I owe it to him, as the duty of an American citizen, to refresh his memory. I have here a little volume labeled "Democratic Campaign Textbook" for 1912, and I wish to read one plank from the platform adopted at Baltimore by the Democratic Party in 1912:

The high cost of living is a serious problem in every American home. The Republican Party, in its platform, attempts to escape from responsibility for present conditions by denying that they are due to a protective tariff. We take issue with them on this subject and charge that excessive prices resulted in a large measure from the high-tariff laws enacted and maintained by the Republican Party and from trusts and commercial conspiracies fostered and encouraged by such laws, and we assert that no substantial relief can be secured for the people until import duties on the necessaries of life are materially reduced and these criminal conspiracies broken up.

I want to read also an extract from the speech of Woodrow Wilson accepting the Democratic nomination for the Presidency in 1912:

"HIGH COST OF LIVING" MADE TO ORDER.

We begin to perceive some things about the movement of prices that concern us very deeply and fix our attention upon the tariff schedules with a more definite determination than ever to get to the bottom of this matter. We have been looking into it, at trials held under the Sherman Act and in investigations in the committee rooms of Congress, where men who wanted to know the real facts have been busy with inquiry, and we begin to see very clearly what at least some of the methods are by which prices are fixed. We know that they are not fixed by the competitions of the market or by the ancient law of supply and demand which is to be found stated in all the primers of economics, but by private arrangements among the producers themselves. Those who buy are not even represented by counsel. The high cost of living is arranged by private understanding.

Mark you, in 1912 Mr. Wilson said that the high cost of living was due to "private understanding."

Now, in 1919 he tells you that it is due primarily to the fact that the Senate has not ratified something which was not even dreamed of in 1912. [Applause on the Republican side.] A single-track mind is a most wonderful institution. It makes a man very often say and do some very queer and inconsistent things. [Laughter.]

Oh, we remember the campaign of 1912. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] We remember, because you gained that election through absolute misrepresentation, and you have since failed to keep your faith with the people. [Applause on the Republican side.] I remember the campaign of 1912, when our Democratic friends insisted that the paramount issue was the high cost of living. I recall how some Democratic spellbinders, some of them here in this audience now, traveled from the rock-bound coast of the Atlantic to the peaceful shores of the Pacific, and with tears of sympathy coursing down their brazen cheeks told the honest workingmen of this country, the horny-handed sons of toil, that if they elected Wilson President and got control of Congress they would reduce the tariff and bring about a reduction in the high cost of living. They said that they would once again put steaks and chops and wearing apparel, including socks and B. V. D.'s, in the reach of the workingmen. They elected Wilson; they got control of Congress; they reduced the tariffs; and up, up, steadily up, went the cost of living.

But here is a remarkable thing: From the day the Democrats got control of Congress a strange and mysterious silence has enveloped that side of the Chamber so far as the paramount issue of 1912 is concerned. We have not heard a single chirp or a murmur. Every Democrat has maintained a dignified silence and exercised a most masterly inactivity. [Applause on the Republican side.] And during all those six years there has not been a single, solitary attempt made by your Democratic Department of Justice to bring a single, solitary food profiteer to the bar of justice. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Oh, yesterday my distinguished friend, the minority leader of the House, for whom I entertain the most affectionate regard, expressed his deep lament that Congress had not yet done anything to take the people out of the clutches of the food profiteer. My good friend was Speaker of this House for eight years; for eight years he held the Democratic majority in the hollow of his hand; for eight years he exercised a potential influence in shaping the legislation of his party; and if congressional action is necessary now, as he mentioned yesterday, then why in Heaven's name, with his great ability, did he not start something along that line? [Applause on the Republican side.] I ask:

Where, oh, where, was Roderick then?
One blast upon his bugle horn were worth a thousand men.

[Applause.]

Oh, it will not do for any of our Democratic friends to resort to the plea that we have not sufficient law on the statute books to proceed and go after these profiteers. You know that you have. The Sherman antitrust law, which sprang from the brain of a Republican Senator, which was passed by a Republican Congress, and signed by a Republican President, is still upon the statute books. The very purpose of that law was to get after these combinations in restraint of trade, these criminal conspiracies that you speak of in your platform, these private understandings mentioned by Wilson, these combinations that are to-day robbing you and me and making it impossible for the workingmen of this country to live as American citizens have the right to live. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WELTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RODENBERG. No; I will not.

From the time that Mr. Wilson took the oath of office, from the day he took oath to enforce the laws of this country and to support the Constitution, there has not been a single effort made to apply the Sherman antitrust law to any of the scoundrels who are robbing you and me. [Applause on the Republican side.] You can not point to a single instance. It has been a dead letter. It has fallen into innocuous desuetude. Nothing has been done; nothing will be done. But now my distinguished and good friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] expresses some solicitude about the political complexion of the next Congress. I will tell him that he need not worry about the Republican side of the House, because when the sins of omission and of commission of the Democratic Party are brought home to the people next year, as they will be, there will not be enough Democrats elected to constitute pallbearers to carry the corpse of the Democratic Party to its last resting place. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Oh, my friends, I now appeal to our President to wake up and to get his mind back on the track of domestic duty. I ask him to transfer his thoughts from Europe and her intrigues to America and her necessities. [Applause on the Republican side.] I ask him to quit dreaming about a spiritual brotherhood and to devote his time to our own home problems, for the solution of which he was elected President of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] Oh, I beseech him; yes, I implore him, to forget for a while all about the provisions of article 10 and to instruct his Attorney General to take the necessary steps that will bring about a reduction in at least 10 articles of provisions that enter into the consumption of the household.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RODENBERG. I would like about three minutes more.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. RODENBERG. I know, of course, that the President has been away a long, long time. I know that he has lived for the last nine months in a palace in Paris, surrounded by every comfort and every luxury. I know he has not come in contact with the high cost of living as you and I have. But I want to say to him in all good faith that now where there is one man in a thousand who cares a rap about the league of nations there are nine hundred and ninety-nine who are vitally and distressingly concerned about the high cost of living. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is a question that is ever present; it has invaded every home and it haunts every fireside in this broad land of ours. It is a question that must be solved, and solved promptly, and the solution of that question lies not with Congress. It lies with the Department of Justice and with the Chief Executive of the United States, whose name is Woodrow Wilson. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. LEE of Georgia. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if there is one question which is uppermost in the mind of every citizen among the 110,000,000 of people in America it is this problem of how to meet the cost of living.

The gentleman who has just preceded me [Mr. RODENBERG] said that it was strange that the President of this Nation has only just now discovered that the cost of living is an acute subject. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois and to his party on the Republican side of the House, who are now in control, that while you have been in power you have never done anything on the floor of this Congress to bring about relief, and you made no move until the President of the Nation came before you and called it to your attention. It took the burning message of the President to sear into your brain the all-absorbing question of the high cost of living and your duty in respect thereto—your party that has in this Congress shown itself lacking in vision to grasp the constructive problems that confront this Nation by reason of a World War; and your party, further showing its incapacity to handle these reconstruction problems, was in the act of adjourning for some weeks' recess when the burning message of the President brought you to your senses and forced you to abandon your recess and deal with the cost-of-living problem. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Ah, when these things are pointed out you have not yet shown your capacity to remedy the evil, but all of you have done what the gentleman from Illinois did this morning; you have gotten up on the floor of this House and denounced the President of the United States of America, the leading citizen of the world to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The people of this Nation want to know what you are doing to grant relief. That is the answer to your assault.

There is something in the proposition made by the President that as long as another body fails to give us peace when it has the power to give us peace the conditions in the world in a business way will remain unsettled. And let me say in passing that notwithstanding all your criticism of the league of nations, your party is going to vote for every syllable of it. Mark my prediction. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As long as the conditions are unsettled business is going to be deranged. Nobody knows what to do. No business man knows what steps to take. No farmer knows how to engage his attention as to what his products shall be next year in the unsettled condition of the world. Give us peace, and it will be a long step in returning us to the normal affairs of this country, and the responsibility is with your party to give us this peace. Make the most of it.

Now, the Committee on Agriculture has had under consideration for several days the suggestion made by the President as to amending the food-control law. We have had witnesses before us day after day, and we have tried to go as far as we could in the solution of the problems that confront us, and we have reported a bill here, and the country should know that when that bill comes before the House the first utterance made in reference to the legislation is not an utterance made by a member of the committee in advocacy of this bill, but it is an utterance, a political utterance, made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG], who is not a member of the committee and who does not refer to this bill and to the relief that we hope it may grant, and in all probability he has not read the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It is politics you are after. You are not giving your people relief at home, and they will get no comfort out of the speech made by the gentleman from Illinois as to how the cost of living is going to be reduced.

Now, then, what are some of the troubles? My friends, we have been in war nearly five years. Millions of men have been taken out of the productive avocations. Millions of them have paid the penalty of war and lie beneath the sod. Production has in a large measure been stopped. The nations of the world face starvation, and the only hope that saves European nations from starvation is the American farmer, God bless him—the hope that the American farmer will not fail them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

He has raised a surplus. This Nation has a surplus. This Nation is called upon to feed not only itself, but to feed the world. The farmer lost much of his productive capacity because his boy went to the other side and fought, bled, and died, but the farmer nevertheless rose early in the morning and stayed at work later at night, and notwithstanding the fact that he had lost his son's labor he produced in abundance.

The question of an embargo has been suggested inferentially by another distinguished gentleman on the Republican side of the House, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. He suggested the proposition of an embargo as one of the remedies in the present situation. Ah, my friends, put an embargo into effect in this Nation against the shipment abroad of food supplies and manufactured articles and against all the things that this great productive Nation produces, and you will bring anarchy and destruction to this beloved country of ours. It will be confusion worse confounded. Labor will be thrown out of employment. Factories will close down. Farming operations will cease to function. Squalor and poverty will reign supreme. Embargo means death as by a surgeon's knife, and yet this is the remedy suggested for the present situation by so eminent a leader on the Republican side of the House, Mr. GOOD of Iowa. Deliver us from such constructive leadership!

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I will not have time to yield until I get through my main statement.

We considered that question before the Committee on Agriculture, and there was no sentiment for putting an embargo provision into this bill. It is a far-reaching proposition. Then what must you have? You have got to encourage production. That is what you have to do; more production on the farm, more production in the factory, more production in the mills, more production from the mines. Production and more production is the watchword. If you place on the statute books something that will hinder production instead of encouraging it, you will simply add more distress to the disturbed conditions that now confront this country.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Not until I get through my statement in chief.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Now in this bill we make two simple amendments to the food act; one as to the articles covered in the first section of that act, where we add the words "wearing apparel and containers." That is recommended by the President and the Attorney General.

Ah, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] again, in criticizing the President, says he has not suggested the proper remedy. If the President did not give you the right remedy why have you not got the constructive ability to bring in the proper remedy and write it into the law? You Republicans are in control of the legislative branch of the Government, and the responsibility is now yours.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. I want to ask, Mr. Chairman, why you waited six years?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yet you suggest nothing of your own. You follow line by line the recommendations made by the President and the Attorney General. Ah, but you answer back, "You have the Sherman antitrust law." Yes; and since the decision of the Supreme Court in the oil case and in the Tobacco Trust case, reading into that law "the rule of reason," that law, as every lawyer knows, and must know, has not been an effective agency or remedy to meet the situation that confronts us.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why did you not make it effective?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Why have you not done it? You are in power. You have been in control for several months, and you have not suggested a constructive policy for anything, and all you know how to do is to flyspeck. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KNUTSON. You had eight years. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I object to gentlemen sitting in their seats interjecting remarks into the speech of anybody. It is an exceedingly bad habit, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] is eternally at it. He does not know what he is talking about.

The CHAIRMAN. It is contrary to the rules of the House and should be avoided.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Under the war-time powers given in this food-control act there was a very drastic regulation that applied to practically everything under the sun; but the power given in that bill was exercised through the Food Administration, a piece of machinery that the bill authorized to be set up. It cost us $1,000,000 a month to keep that machinery in operation with the great force that it had. They used the licensing system in order to give control and hold down prices and make regulations. When the war ceased a demand came up from every section of the country that this piece of machinery go out of existence, and it did go out of existence last February, stopping the expenditure of a million dollars a month for these employees. Under that system if a merchant was selling at too high a rate, the fair-price committee would say to him, "You must stop that practice or your license will be taken from you." They reached the retailer by the method of licensing that they issued to the wholesaler. But that is gone. There is now no way of enforcing the law. You can not call back that great organization. Not a man on that side of the House and not a man on this side of the House wants to call it back into existence with that great expense account again. So, then, while you have these drastic powers you have no method of enforcement. So what was the practical suggestion, not made by the constructive statesmen on the Republican side of the House, but made by the President through his Attorney General and accepted by [illegible] side of the House as being a sane and righteous conclusion to be reached? It was to add a penalty, so that the Attorney General might have a penalty with which to reach the profiteers, and your Committee on Agriculture, Democrats and Republicans alike, reported the bill back with that penalty added.

Now, we did another thing to reach these profiteers. I want to say that publicity amounts to a whole lot in this entire situation. These voluntary fair-price committees are being set up in every county in the Nation. They look after high prices in their respective communities. They have no way to enforce their suggestions, but they simply get the information, and it becomes a matter of publicity in their respective communities, and very few men in those communities, if they are profiteering, would dare go up against the publicity that will be given if they persist in this profiteering process. If they do, this information is furnished to the Department of Justice, and it is then for the Attorney General to proceed against these profiteers after these facts have been given him. We provide the penalty in this bill, so that the Attorney General may proceed in an orderly way. I dare say there will be but few cases where there must be prosecution.

Now, my friends, there is another provision in this bill which will probably cause some debate. We exempted farmers and farm organizations from the provisions of this act for a very sound reason. This legislation is war legislation. It dies when the proclamation of peace is made. What we are attempting to do by this legislation is to make an effort, at least, to reach the high cost of living, in order that there may be a lowering of the scale. But you will not reach that result if you write anything into this law that will discourage production, and the farmers are the producers. They have their cooperative associations and ought to have. I would to God they had more of them. The farmer never in his life named the price of any product that he sold, never. His eggs go to market, but he does not have anything to say as to the price of them. His hogs go to market, but he does not have anything to say as to the price of them. His cattle go to market, but he does not have anything to say as to the price of them. His cotton goes to the market, and while the farmer produced it in the sweat of his face, it is not for him to name the price.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. No; I do not think the gentleman will add anything intelligent to the discussion. The farmer has nothing to say about the price of any of his products. His marketing system is a false one. The distribution system for the farmer's products is rotten to the core. Here lies a productive field for constructive statesmanship. How about the manufacturer? Ah, he has a system of machinery by which he knows the business of the country and knows his customers. He can control his production, can make his market, and meet the situation. How about the manufacturer who makes the farming utensils and implements? They are rich corporations controlled by shrewd business men. They know the condition of the country and their customers and they can organize and control their own business. They can limit or expand production as conditions warrant, and thus control the price of their output. How about the packers? They are the shrewdest bunch of men unhung. They know their business. They know the situation in the entire country. They have the machinery to give it effect, and they know how to organize and meet conditions. They have a complete monopoly by which they name the price of the farmer's product and the price the consumer must pay. The farmer has no such machinery. Take the case of labor. Labor has had the foresight to organize and to inaugurate a collective bargaining system; if the farmer, in order to better his own condition, has the ability to organize and cooperate in an association, then if you subject him to prosecution and drive these organizations out of existence you stop production, and that is a thing we do not want to do. [Applause.]

That is the thing we must not do. Industrial centers have bid for farm labor, and by the thousands this labor has gone to industrial centers to obtain a higher wage scale. They are now consumers. Year by year this process continues. The farms are being abandoned. Remedy it by making farm life more attractive, more remunerative. Give him a better system of distribution. Make him more satisfied with his lot. The farmer does not strike. He has met every demand made of him in peace or war. The record made by the American farmer during the awful World War just ended will ever be a glory of our Republic. Do not hinder, but help by your legislation as it relates to the American farmer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. YOUNG of Texas was given leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FESS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 8076) authorizing the county of Montgomery, Tenn., to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River within 7 miles of Clarksville, Tenn.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 8117) for the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Falls, Wyoming County, Pa.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. WALSH of Montana and Mr. FRANCE members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Treasury Department.

AMENDMENT TO THE FOOD LAW.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman who just preceded me [Mr. YOUNG of Texas] said that in the discussion of this question upon our side nothing has been said with reference to this bill or with reference to the necessity for this measure, but that we content ourselves by trying to make politics out of it. If politics has been injected into this very serious question, the Republicans were not the first to do that in this Hall. The first gentleman to inject politics into this question of the high cost of living was the President of the United States when he delivered his speech here two weeks ago to-day, and I dare say that it was impressed on everyone who heard him at that time that what he said with reference to the high cost of living being attributable to the failure to ratify the peace treaty made at Paris was very far-fetched and that the cause assigned had nothing to do with the high cost of living. Had he gone further and said that it was because of his own intermeddling with the affairs of continental Europe, producing the distressed condition that is there existing, he would have come nearer to stating the truth than he did when he attributed the high cost of living to the failure to ratify the peace treaty.

I wish to call your attention to the opinion of one of the ablest editorial writers in the United States upon this proposition:

WILSON'S PRIVATE WARS KEEP FOOD SCARCE AND MEN STARVING.

As had been predicted, President Wilson has deliberately attempted to play politics with the food prices. In his message to the Congress on food profiteering he tells the country that the first necessity in the reduction of the high cost of living is to pass the peace treaty and the proposed league of nations.

Now, we do not like to say anything reflecting upon the good faith of the President of the United States. But when an intelligent man makes an important statement on an important matter which he knows is not true we can not, in pointing out the false representations in the statement, avoid the implication that the statement is made in bad faith.

If the present distressing situation in Europe is at all responsible for the high cost of living in America, then the President himself shares the responsibility for this high cost of living. Russia and Hungary and Roumania possess the great grain fields of Europe, and President Wilson, in violation of his most solemn promise not to interfere with the right of self-determination of the Russian people, is aiding and abetting in the continuance of the blockade of Russia, by which Russians are prevented from getting railroad supplies and other machine products with which the Russian people can produce grain which will aid to feed the world.

With the consent of President Wilson, Hungary is being blockaded and overrun by Roumanian and other reactionary forces under control of the only remaining landed aristocracy in eastern Europe. Her wheat fields are being devastated and her agricultural enterprises paralyzed, as in Russia.

This brutal war against the people of Hungary, and in support of an autocracy which the people of Hungary have sought to depose, is in violation of the right of self-determination solemnly pledged by President Wilson.

Both wars are being waged because President Wilson, Clemenceau, and Lloyd-George do not like the kind of democratic government that the people of Hungary and Russia have established.

So, these three arbitrary dictators starve all the plain people they can, while at the same time they recognize the brutal murderers, Mannerheim and Kolchak, who have destroyed democracy and plain democratic people werever they have found them. Furthermore, Assistant Secretary of State Polk has just announced that the United States Government proposes to aid, with supplies, Kolchak, the czarist reactionary, fighting the Russian people with the object of restoring the old Russian despotism.

If there is any condition in Europe which is responsible for the high cost of living it is the unofficial private war which these dictators of England, France, and America, in violation of every known principle of humanity, of international law, and of every one of their own personal professions and promises, are waging against Russia and Hungary.

Let President Wilson stop playing politics and attend to the high cost of living. The American people can not be stampeded into ratification of his dangerous, despotic, un-American league of nations by the pretense that the conditions in Europe will be cured by any such death knell to democracy.

That is from the Chicago Herald-Examiner. Here is an amazing proposition. The law conferring upon the President the right to prohibit hoarding and profiteering was given to him away back in the early part of August, 1917. This Congress anticipating that such a condition might arise, where men taking advantage of the war would seek to hoard, would seek to profiteer, would seek, if you please, to take every advantage peculiar to the situation, passed the act of August 10, 1917, which gave the President all of the rights that are included in the proposed bill, with the exception of very slight enlargements. What did the President do? What did the administration do when the prices were going higher and higher, when there was evidence of hoarding upon every hand, and when the Government of the United States became the chief hoarder? What was done by the President of the United States under this law? Absolutely nothing. Personally he was not here to do anything, and when appeals were made to his subordinates left in charge of the various departments the reply would come that we would have to wait until the Chief got back. That was not only so of the State Department, but it was so of the War Department and the War Trade Bureau, and I know that gentlemen on this side who were interested in seeing that the embargo that was then existing, and which in a measure yet exists, with reference to the transportation of cotton, should be lifted, when for the purpose of getting relief they appealed to the authorities, were told that they would have to wait until the Chief got back from the other side. Merchants had been encouraged to establish new business relations across the seas, but were estopped from shipping their goods there by reason of the censorship, not of an officer of the United States, but by reason of the censorship of an officer of the Government of England being placed in the customhouses of the United States who determined what goods should and what goods should not be shipped out of this country, and when relief was asked from that condition they were told that they would have to wait until the Chief got back from across the seas. That was the situation.

Not until the 29th day of July, 1919, on which day a resolution offered by the special committee to investigate the expenditures in the War Department was passed, was this administration awakened to the fact that ample laws were upon the statute books that would do all the things that are contemplated in the measure presented for consideration to-day.

Under the resolution just referred to demand was made upon the administration to release from the control of the War Department more than $100,000,000 worth of provisions that were being hoarded by the Government itself. During the course of that debate, and by reason of the hearings of the committee upon which this resolution was based, it became perfectly patent that hoarding was going on throughout the country and that that hoarding was being done by the very sanction and connivance of the administration.

Public sentiment was so aroused by the facts thus made public that the Department of Justice then commenced for the first time to enforce the provisions of the act of August 10, 1917, since which time numerous suits have been instituted throughout the country to stop profiteering. Some convictions have already been had, millions and millions of dollars of property hoarded has been thrown upon the market and is tending, in some small degree, to reduce the high cost of living.

Had these same drastic measures been pursued from the time of the passage of the act of August 10, 1917, with the same vigor that seems now to be prompting the Department of Justice, I dare say that we would not find ourselves in the present distressed condition that we are in with reference to the high cost of living.

Under this act of August 10, 1917, the President was authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as might be necessary to effectively secure the following objects specified in the act, to wit:

> To secure an adequate supply and equitable distribution and to facilitate the movement of food, feeds, fuel, etc., including tools, utensils, implements, machinery, and equipment required for the actual production of foods, feeds, and fuel referred to in the act as necessaries; to prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, or injurious speculations, manipulations, and private controls affecting such supply, distribution, and movement; and to so establish and maintain governmental control of all such necessaries during the war.

This act also provided as follows:

> That the President is authorized, from time to time, to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell for cash at reasonable prices wheat, flour, meal, beans, potatoes—

And so forth. It was made unlawful—

> For any person to hoard, as defined in section 6 of this act, any necessaries, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate of charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries, to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person to restrict the supply of any necessaries, or to restrict distribution of any necessaries, or to exact excessive prices for any necessaries.

What greater power should the President want then, or now, to do the things which has been his duty all this time to be doing?

In addition, however, to the above act of August 10, 1917, this Congress passed an act on July 9, 1918, making provision for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1919, which contained the following provision:

> That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, through the head of any executive department, to sell upon such terms as the head of such department shall deem expedient, to any person, partnership, association, or corporation, or other department of the Government * * * any war supplies, material, and equipment, and any by-product thereof.

Instead of enforcing these laws and preventing the very things that are now menacing every section of our country, what was done by this administration through its various administration activities?

We find that the Secretary of War made an arrangement with the canners of vegetables whereby the supply of canned goods purchased by the War Department should be held and not disposed of to the public in the United States until this year's pack of canned vegetables could be canned, and I dare say that that arrangement would have been continued down to this goodly hour had it not been for the work of the committee on war expenditures, to which I have referred.

However, this is not all. The Food Administrator, with the sanction of the President of the United States, entered into an agreement with the packers of meats and meat products in the United States, whereby the supply of meats and fats in the hands of the War Department should be disposed of only so as to provide a steady flow and not to affect injuriously the market price on such commodities. In consequence of this agreement millions of pounds of meat were not only kept away from the people of the United States, hoarded by the Government through an unholy agreement with the packers, but these meats have been forever lost, for it has been discovered that carload after carload has spoiled, has been burned or buried by the Government, and in some cases they sought to keep this fact away from the public and away from this Congress.

Thus it is readily seen that by the action of this Government, in violation of the law that I have referred to and by reason of the compact that the Government entered into with the canning packers and with the meat packers, the supply of these very necessary products is greatly limited, and this, to my mind, is one of the chief reasons why the price of these necessities has soared so high.

In addition to all this the Congress voted $100,000,000 to relieve the hunger in continental Europe. That $100,000,000 is supposed to have been invested and no doubt was invested in food products of the United States and transported to Europe, and at the very time that this was done, millions of dollars' worth of Army provisions were in Europe that could have been utilized for this very purpose. But this was not done.

Is it any wonder that we have a food shortage in this country? Is it any wonder that the prices have been going higher and higher all the time when the Government has been the principal party in producing the conditions now confronting us?

The President, in his address to the Congress on the 8th day of this month, in discussing the high cost of living, used the following language:

> May I not call attention to the fact, also, that although the present act—food-control act—prohibits profiteering, the prohibition is accompanied by no penalty. It is clearly in the public interest that the penalty should be provided which will be persuasive.

In making this statement the President demonstrated his great anxiety to excuse himself for not having enforced the pure-food act, and of his great desire to pass the buck to the Congress. Again playing, if you please—as was stated in the Chicago Herald articles—politics and nothing but politics. The pure-food act to which the President referred is teeming with penalties, ample to cover every infraction of the act, and furnishing fit punishment for every violator of the same.

The penalties in the food-control act are:

Section 3 of the act provides a maximum penalty of a $10,000 fine or five years' imprisonment, or both, for anyone connected with the Government selling to the Government.

Section 5 provides for the license of manufacturers and storage houses, and provides a maximum penalty of a $5,000 fine, or two years' imprisonment, or both, for anyone who refuses to discontinue any unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, in accordance with the license regulation.

Section 6 provides a maximum penalty of a $5,000 fine, or two years' imprisonment, or both, for any person who willfully hoards any necessities, and defines the term "hoarding."

Section 7 provides procedure by the district attorneys to prosecute and institute libel proceedings against any such hoarders.

Section 8 provides a maximum penalty of a $5,000 fine, or imprisonment for two years, or both, for any person who destroys necessaries to enhance the price or restrict the supply thereof.

Section 9 provides a maximum penalty of a $10,000 fine, or imprisonment for two years, or both, for any person who conspires, combines, or agrees to limit facilities of transportation, production, manufacturing, supplying, or dealing in any necessities; or restricts the supply of any necessities; or prevents, or limits, or lessens the manufacture or production of necessities.

Section 13 provides a maximum penalty of a $10,000 fine, or imprisonment for four years, or both, for those violating any of the President's regulations about boards of trade, exchange, and so forth.

Section 15 provides a maximum punishment of a $5,000 fine, or imprisonment for two years, or both, for anyone violating any of the provisions in regard to the use of grain in the production of liquors and beverages.

Section 17 provides a maximum punishment of a $1,000 fine, or one year's imprisonment, or both, for any person who interferes with any United States officer in the execution of any duty imposed by this act.

Section 25 provides a maximum punishment of a $5,000 fine, or imprisonment for two years, or both, for anyone receiving higher prices than have been fixed by the President.

Section 26 is a blanket penalty provision for the whole act, which is as follows:

That any person carrying on or employed in commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, or with or in the Territories or other possessions of the United States in any article suitable for human food, fuel, or other necessaries of life, who, either in his individual capacity or as an officer, agent, or employee of a corporation or member of a partnership carrying on or employed in such trade, shall store, acquire, or hold, or who shall destroy or make away with any such article for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price thereof in such commerce, whether temporarily or otherwise, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

I dare say that there is not a lawyer in this House who, after carefully reading the pure-food act and the penalties provided therein, will contend for one moment but that there is ample provision already made for the President to successfully prosecute every malefactor who is hoarding or profiteering in food stuffs.

Now that the President has come back home, we sincerely hope that he will take time to attend to the business of this country that is in such sore need of his attention and pay less attention to European political affairs, with which we should have nothing to do and from whose entanglements we should forever keep ourselves free. We also sincerely hope that he will give more time to informing himself as to what the laws of our country are, so that he may satisfy the needs of our people through the just enforcement of the same.

If he will do this, he will find this Congress ever ready to aid and abet him with any additional laws needed for the betterment of the conditions of the people of our own country.

While I am still of the opinion that everything that can be done under this proposed measure could have been done under the acts that I have referred to, yet we will pass this bill so that the President can have no excuse to say that he has not the authority with which to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. WOOD of Indiana was granted leave to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, there is no man in the House more deeply interested in an endeavor to decrease the high cost of living than am I. I favor this bill simply because the limitation on it is only to the extent of the proclamation of peace. I would not favor it if it went beyond that, because of the fact that I am absolutely opposed to putting restrictions upon any greater number of people in the United States than are already under them. It is my belief as a business man that no definite reduction can come in the high cost of living by reason of the passage of this act. I am convinced that there will be no lasting reduction in the high cost of living until that time arrives when production overlaps consumption, and I do not expect that to come in this country until we are met by our competitors in the markets of the world and are unable to compete. Then this great balance of trade that is now in our favor will turn against us, our products will back up on us at home, and we will have no trouble about the reduction of the high cost of living. This can not be done, in my judgment, by any act that we create here. The question of profiteering is too generally in vogue. If every man in this House would search his own conscience and consider his neighbor along the line of that conscience he would readily understand why it will be impossible by these further restrictions that you are going to put on him to bring down the high cost of living.

I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article written by me at its request for the Utica (N. Y.) Herald-Dispatch, as follows:

The Old Testament records the fact that some thousands of years ago the venerable Joshua demanded that the sun stand still, and it stood still. No one since that time has attempted to trifle with the laws of gravitation. It is exceedingly doubtful whether the present age has produced a man or set of men who could perform the same feat. The Railroad Brotherhoods have demanded that the high cost of living be immediately reduced. If there ever was a problem for a modern Joshua here it is.

By their demands the railroad employees have put this problem squarely up to the administration. The administration has seen fit to pass it on to Congress, evidently with the hope that some constructive legislation may be enacted that will tend to reduce the cost of living temporarily at least. One of the methods suggested is the abolition of profiteering. In my opinion there is at the present time a great deal of profiteering in business in the United States, which naturally tends to increase the legitimate selling price on all articles of consumption. If this profiteering were limited to any certain class of producers or merchants the question of restricting their methods would be comparatively simple. The President of the United States by right of the authority vested in him by the Overman Act still has the power to correct the evils which exist. It is not by any means a new problem which now confronts him or the country at large. The same problem existed while he was absent in France, and he still has the same power which he had then to attempt to remedy the difficulty. Under the Overman Act broad powers were given him for the period of the emergency and for a space of six months afterwards. Just why he feels that it is now necessary for him to go before Congress with the matter is a little difficult for me to determine.

However, profiteering is by no means confined to the packers or the larger business interests of the United States. Profiteering begins at the very basis of production in this country—the wage earner. During the war he obtained higher wages than ever before in the history of this country. Now that the war is over, he is continuing to receive these and higher wages. Not only that but he is using every bit of force at his disposal to obtain from his employer the highest possible wage and the fewest possible hours of labor. This same thing is true on up the scale. The retail merchant is no longer satisfied with the same percentage of profit on his sales as he was in the prewar period. The manufacturer and the farmer each in turn are demanding and getting a greater return on their investments. An attempt, therefore, to regulate the question of profiteering can be only a temporary expedient unless a method can be devised whereby the remedy can be applied throughout the scale.

In this connection it is also well for us to remember that the situation which is now forced upon us is affected to a very large extent by the "cost of high living." For instance, gasoline is retailing at 28 cents per gallon. To the average man, gasoline is not absolutely necessary. He can live without it. He did live without it successfully for a great many thousand years and yet with the price as it stands to-day he is continuing to buy it and use it. Some one has to pay for it. Naturally, as long as people are willing to pay 28 cents a gallon for it, the price will stay at 28 cents a gallon. What particular difference would it make to a man who has just paid $450 for a Ford automobile whether the average amount of flour used by the average family in the United States under the present prices costs 3½ cents per day or whether it costs 50 per cent less—1¾ cents per day?

I believe that the question of the high cost of living goes altogether too deeply into the plain fundamentals of economics to be handled by law. Any action that the President or Congress may take in seeking to solve the problem will be at the best only a temporary expedient and will never permanently correct the condition which exists. There is, in my opinion, one remedy, and only one. It is the old question of supply and demand which is as old as the history of trade and barter in the world.

The minute we produce more than we consume the cost of living will go down. How are we going to produce as much as we consume and more? Certainly not by the principle of limited output and a reduction of working hours. It is axiomatic that you can take out of a pail as much water as you put in it and no more. It does not matter from what angle you approach this subject of the high cost of living. Ultimately your argument must come back to the basic law which governs the cost—the law of supply and demand. Just so long as a man who produces either by the work of his brain or the sweat of his brow clings to the principle that the higher money return he gets for his efforts and the less he works at his production, whatever it may be, the better his economic condition is, just so long will the cost of living remain where it is or increase in spite of any attempts to regulate it by law. The farmer to-day has been led to believe that it is better to sell the milk from 40 cows at a higher price than to sell the milk from 100 cows at a lower price. The employee has been taught that it is better to produce 50 pieces at 10 cents apiece than 100 pieces at 5 cents apiece. This is all right if he is willing to pay that much more for his milk and the manufactured things that he uses, but he is not willing to pay more. He demands that the high cost of living be reduced. Just how it can be reduced he does not say.

If every producer in this country would make up his mind that the only logical method of reducing the high cost of living was to himself produce more per 24 hours than he is producing now, then with the resultant gain in wages to him would come unquestionably the ultimate decrease in the cost of living.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we are glad to welcome the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] from his extended vacation. We are delighted that he is back here in time to chide in their absence those Members on his side who still linger amid the delights of the seaside resorts. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman returns in fine fettle. It is too bad they could not have had him in the splendid form in which he appears to-day when they started to turn the tide of war at the Battle of the Marne! [Applause on the Republican side.] We could not spare the gentleman, of course. But while he spends his time wrapping the flag about his portly form and weaving panegyrics on the soldier boys, Congress is proceeding deliberately and intelligently to enact legislation to protect those boys from the hoarders and profiteers that have been preying on them since they have returned home.

Mr. Chairman, in the President's recent message on the high cost of living he suggested certain specific amendments to the act of August 7, 1917, the food stimulation act, and the Attorney General prepared a bill intended to provide the remedies in the form of amendments which the President suggested. They have been carefully considered by the Committee on Agriculture, which committee has promptly reported the bill to Congress as requested by the administration.

By its action in this matter the Congress clearly indicates its desire to cooperate promptly and in good faith with the officials of the administration. Congress has done and Congress will do its duty, and though often disappointed, we still entertain the hope that the administration and its departments and bureaus will do their duty under the extensive powers which Congress has granted. We still hope they will begin to realize the obligation that rests on them, and effectively exercise the tremendous powers that Congress has placed in their hands. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It must have been a good deal of a shock to the average citizen to have the President declare to Congress two years after the enactment of the food-stimulation act that that act was not sufficiently comprehensive and that one of its sections lacked an effective penalty.

We well remember the celerity with which the Congress enacted that legislation in the form suggested by the administration, and the assurances which were then given of its sufficiency and of its prompt execution. Two years and one day elapsed from the date of the signing of that legislation to the day when the President announced that the Department of Justice had just discovered faults and omissions in the legislation—two years during which, not only in war but in the period of peace since the armistice, prices have mounted higher and higher; two years during which various departments of Government have borne testimony to the prevalence of unlawful hoarding and the widespread practice of profiteering; two years during which the administration had made so little effort to effectively exercise the enormous war powers conferred by the act of August 7, 1917, that it had not discovered what the department now proclaims to be a fact—that the legislation is ineffective without further extension and additional penalties.

Congress is promptly supplying those alleged deficiencies. Will the administration do any better with this increased authority than it has with the tremendous war powers which it has so long possessed?

It is true that the President has not been on the scene the last few months; that he has considered the affairs of other peoples so much more important than those duties he was elected to discharge that he has absented himself during a large part of the period during which prices have mounted in spite of the cessation of hostilities. But even the absence of the President ought not to have resulted in a complete paralysis of the machinery of law execution. If the sworn official guardians of the law had been one-half as active in the enforcement of the laws which Congress has provided as they have been in proposing and suggesting new legislation it would be infinitely better for the country.

The Congress proceeds to do its duty now, as it has promptly at all times since the beginning of the war. Is it not about time that the administration and its agencies take some effective action in the enforcement of the laws which the Congress provides?

May we hope, reminded of the hope long deferred that maketh the heart sick—may we hope that at last, finally and eventually, this administration will be aroused to its duty and exercise toward the reduction of the high cost of living the powers which the Congress grants? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman and colleagues, of course in seven minutes I can hardly do justice to this subject; and, then, I come to you so terribly frightened by the political threat made by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] as to what they are going to do to us next year that in my temerity I should not have been able to take the floor at all if I did not remember the result in Kentucky a few days ago. With the league of nations as the issue, a Democratic district elects a Republican Congressman. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The high cost of living is shown by the editorial placed in the RECORD by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], written by a distinguished editor, and published in the Hearst newspapers in Chicago—papers that supported Mr. Wilson for election—and they say that when "an intelligent man makes an important statement upon an important subject which he knows is not true" it is their duty to call attention to his lack of good faith. This language is not mine. I have no disposition to use unkind or unpleasant language. I like to use pleasant language. But the time has come when this "halo," and the "Moses" business, and the "savior" business for one man ought to be brought to common earth. The President of the United States is entitled to the respect of the office he holds. He is my President, but I thank God every hour of my life that he is not my king. [Applause on the Republican side.] He has exceeded the powers of the President of the United States and usurped the powers of a king and "dictator," just as Mr. Hearst's papers say.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] says that we are fighting the league of nations. He is mistaken. We are fighting the league of nations proposed by the President of the United States, who seeks to promote his ambition from President of the United States to the president of the whole world. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is the truth about it. I stood at this desk and for an hour's time defended the league of nations, because I supposed when he went over there he would stand by his 14 points of self-determination. I love peace. I have been branded as a pacifist because I love peace.

I believe he intended well. And now he comes back, and while he whispers to the man in the moon that he "gained all of his 14 points," his own Secretary of State testifies before the Senate committee that not one of those 14 points was even considered by the league of nations. [Applause on the Republican side.] Whom shall we believe?

And now what does he say to enforce his doctrine—not a league to promote peace but a league to promote war, a league to compel every American to go to arms whenever the league of nations shall call, as they have called us now in Siberia, where 4,000 boys from my State are fighting the "private" war of Woodrow Wilson without a declaration of war? They have been starving and freezing there, 4,000 from my district alone, and if those 4,000 boys had been allowed to come home they could have made enough food for us in Illinois to have helped reduce this high cost of living. They are kept there now, they say, to guard railroads. They are, in fact, kept there, as I shall show, as a collection agency, and they are trading American blood to help the money lenders of the world to gather the interest and principal upon the ancient Russian bonds. The fathers and mothers, wives, and brothers of these brave boys are here and you will hear from them later. For the President of the United States the "halo" time has gone, so far as I am concerned.

The war is over. Of course, we stood by him in the war. Of course, we know his sacrifices in his work. When our boys were in the front line at Chateau-Thierry he consented—the President of the United States drew forth his trusty fountain pen and consented—that his own son-in-law could bare his breast to the dangers of the Y. M. C. A. [Laughter.] And now he stands before the people and in this Chamber, or, at least, to the people he says, "Do you want cheaper shoes? Then you must stand by the rape of China by Japan and turn over 36,000,000 republicans to the worst autocrat in the world, the kaiser of Asia, the Mikado. Do that. Let us turn over the real democracy of Asia to the autocracy of Asia, and then I will get you cheaper bacon and will lower the price of ham and prunes."

Here is Great Britain. We must help her. She came over here and spoke to the President, and then to us, and then to the Senate, and shed tears at the grave of Washington, and then marched down to the Treasury and held out her hat for our money and our boys, and now her chief soldier says she won the war before our boys got there.

"And now do you want cheaper shoes? Do you want cheaper bacon? Then Great Britain must have five judges to our one in the settlement of international controversies." Potatoes, cabbages, tomatoes, and canned corn will be free if you will agree to furnish American blood and money to see that no new republic shall ever be born. Ratify the most wicked treaty ever negotiated and your Uncle Sam may occupy the island of Yap and become a wet nurse for Turkey.

Let us do away with this sanctimonious doctrine that we have been hearing about the President of the United States. He won his nomination in a convention when a majority had agreed upon another man. He was elected by a split in the protection party the first time, and the last time he was elected because he had convinced the people that he had kept us out of war, when the only people he kept out of war were Teddy Roosevelt and Gen. Leonard Wood. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And now to-day he is trying to fool the American people by telling them that he is going to keep us out of war again. It is the old trick, and the only question is whether or not the American people are hen-headed enough to be fooled twice by the same trick. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, it might be in order for me to make a few political remarks myself. [Laughter.] I scarcely think I will take the time of the House now. Four of the heavy guns of the Republican Party have just consumed their full quota of time bemeaning and denouncing the President while the world waits an opportunity to have something done about the food bill and the food-profiteering situation. That may be the best way to solve this problem. It may be. But in the minds of some people who are paying $18 a pair for shoes that cost $8.50, and in the minds of some of the people who are paying 500 per cent profit on groceries and the food and clothes that they use, those four political speeches made by the four principal and leading Republican Members of the House, no one of whom is on the committee, may or may not be euphonious. These speeches may or may not be euphonious to them. I do not know. They may or may not glorify your conduct in playing politics here to-day while men, women, and children are everywhere suffering from extortionate prices.

About two weeks ago it was the thought of the great Republican Party on that side of the aisle, and acceded to by most of us on our side, to take a five-weeks recess. It did not occur to the leaders of the Republican Party who have occupied time to-day that something ought to have been done about the food situation then. They had omitted to deal with it at all. They did not intend to deal with it at all. You started home with hat in hand, and President Wilson, whom you to-day bemean, who is yet the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, who is yet our President, twice elected—not of your political faith, it is true, but our President—asked you to remain here, and do what? Do something about profiteering. He felt it to be his duty. It was his duty. You believed it your duty, because you are following him. From your remarks here to-day it would be the thought of those who heard you that you despised your President, that you despised the man who had asked you to remain here and deal with this situation. But I know it is not true, because every one of you abandoned your five-weeks vacation and remained here to do the things that the President asked you to do. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You did what he asked you to do. You say he is not your leader. You denounce him. You oppose him. You obstruct him. You apparently hate and despise him, but nevertheless you do the things he asks you to do, and you are doing them this day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If I denounced at every opportunity either President or private citizen I would not follow him. I would vote against him. I would not content myself to talk against him only.

I walked the streets of my district less than 10 days ago with a soldier who stopped at a grocery store to buy a head of cabbage. The grocer charged him 6 cents a pound for it. He grumbled at the price as he stepped out of the door, and I saw a farm wagon standing in front of the door with half a load of cabbage. The farmer did not know that my friend was a soldier, because my friend was in civilian clothes. I said to the farmer, "What are you doing with that load of cabbage?" He replied, "I am selling it to these merchants." "At how much?" I asked him. He replied, "One cent a pound." That soldier who served us so recently and so well was paying 500 per cent, which the farmer did not get, which the merchant was not entitled to, and I hope this bill will protect and defend not only our soldiers but our people from such extortion. I can not think such a course a just one. I can not think such extortion should be swept hurriedly aside. That is going on everywhere.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I regret I can not. I have only a moment in which to conclude, and my remarks will not be the last word on the subject.

Again I talked with a soldier who had been discharged and was ready to doff his uniform. He set out to buy civilian clothes and again to introduce himself into society and become a full-fledged civilian. This was his story: He stepped into a store in Washington when he returned and asked for a pair of low-quarter shoes. He was asked $18 for that pair of shoes. He went home and had his own merchant order him a pair made of the same leather, the same last, the same size, and his own merchant charged him $8.75. I do not know what you are going to do here to-day.

Will any one of the six and one-half million farmers approve of such conduct? Will any one of the 20,000,000 toilers approve of such a condition? Will honest business men anywhere approve of any such unconscionable profits? Will the Congress sitting here as the representative of the 110,000,000 people allow this to go on? I am not for regulation of everything from Washington. I can not think that is the best way. What I do say is that such profits are vicious, unconscionable, and should be stopped, and stopped now.

Perhaps these Republican partisan speeches made here to-day will remedy that. I do not know, but it seems to me that somewhere along the line the Congress ought to do something about this condition. It seems to me the President and Attorney General are right in urging this. I want to congratulate the Agricultural Committee on bringing in this bill. Members of the committee are not making political speeches here to-day. They are really here trying to do something to meet this abnormal situation. Of course, as elections draw near it is so very natural to spar back and forth across the aisle, but I submit this is hardly the time or place to constantly be playing politics. This is most too serious a matter. It is very natural to try to make ourselves believe momentarily that we hate one another, but that is not the fact. We do no such thing. You do not hate your President. You are merely allowing partisanship to override your patriotism and your sense of justice. You are merely screaming out against him and each day voting with him.

The real truth is, you people over there on the Republican side, while you scold him and nag at him and hound him and try to belittle him, you uniformly follow him. You may hate to do it, but you do it. Now, one of two things must be true, either there must be virtue in what he stands for or you are unwilling to follow your own judgment. The only instance that stands out paramount where this Congress has not followed him is on the repeal of the daylight-saving law the other day, and we on the Democratic side, feeling it our duty, helped you to overturn him on that.

What law that we have enacted for the 20,000,000 toilers of this country have you repealed or will you repeal? What law are you ready to repeal that we have enacted for the business men of the country?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman four minutes more.

Mr. FERRIS. What laws that the Democracy have passed and that Woodrow Wilson has advocated, other than some temporary war measure, will you repeal or do you intend to repeal? Will you repeal the $1 Sherwood pension bill passed for the soldier? Will you repeal the increase in the pay of the soldiers of the German war—increased both in peace and in war from $15 to $30 per month? No. Will you repeal the Federal reserve banking and currency act? No. Will you repeal the eight-hour law? No. Will you repeal the anti-injunction law? No. Will you repeal the good-roads law? No. Will you repeal the farm-loan law? No. Just let some one of the four Republican leaders who talked here this afternoon go down the catalogue of bills that we passed, and let him advocate their repeal. You could not hold your own side together—5 per cent of them—to do that. No; you are not for the repeal of our laws. No; you are not willing to declare any policy for their repeal. You merely complain. You merely play politics. You merely fiddle while Rome burns.

One word more. I do not know whether this bill is going to do all that we want it to do. I have confidence that that great arm of the Government, the Department of Justice, will do its full duty, as we are doing our full duty to-day, in trying to curb this unusual, abnormal condition and profiteering incident to the closing of the world's greatest war.

I do not believe in peace time in regulation far removed from the people. I do not believe this Congress can pass an act that will legislate more brains into one man's head than there are in the heads of 110,000,000 people. I am not in favor, now or in the future, of passing any law that will allow some one man to sit in Washington and regulate everybody everywhere on everything in peace times. Some one might very well criticize that statement by saying that we voted for it in the food act during the war. Yes; we all did that during the war, and I would do it again in the midst of the world's greatest war. I did not then, I will not in the future, hamper or refuse my Government during war times. It is not my province during war time to obstruct a Republic that is engaged in trying to conduct and win a war. It would be my province, if I could, in some way to help them and not to hinder them. But in peace times I think this bill does just about what it ought to do. It authorizes prosecution for breaches of the law. It exempts the farmer from all its operations. This is entirely defensible, as it encourages production. To curb it, to constantly be regulating it, is not justifiable, because the farmer is not a hoarder, is not a profiteer. He raises his own crops and sells them. He is in no sense a dealer. He is a producer; he is not a profiteer. It places in the hands of the prosecuting officers of the Government the power to prosecute men who profiteer and disobey the law. It deals with men who hoard and who viciously try to glean abnormal profits from the people, who are defenseless.

I have full faith in the Attorney General. He was long a Member of this House. He is able; he is patriotic; he will deal with the profiteer; he will let honest production alone; he will help the consumer; he will faithfully administer the law. The American people demand this much. They are going to have this much from these dealers who are taking toll from both producer and consumer. The trouble is not with the farmer. He is not an extortionist; he is not unpatriotic. He merely asks a fair chance to serve the world; yea, to feed the world.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I have not much time, but I want to be courteous; I yield.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman cited the cabbage incident. There is nothing in this bill that would empower the General Government to handle a situation of that kind, is there?

Mr. FERRIS. If they were not hoarding. If that is not an abuse, I do not know one. If not, I would like to have that reached also. I make no effort to shield anyone who takes 500 per cent from the poor.

Mr. REAVIS. Is it not the duty of your State government to meet that situation?

Mr. FERRIS. I am not a member of the Agricultural Committee. Some member of the Agricultural Committee who is better versed than I can perhaps answer that better than I; but if the returning soldiers of the country and the law-abiding citizens of the country have to pay a 500 per cent profit on the necessaries of life I am opposed to that. This abnormal condition of war and reconstruction should not be the means of making a few men enormously rich at the expense of all the rest of us. Good men everywhere, whether they be producers or consumers, will, I am sure, help with this. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take any time in general debate to discuss the bill under consideration, which proposes to lower the "high cost of living," but in view of what has been said and in order to correct the RECORD, I believe it my duty, as chairman of the committee, to answer some of the statements made. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG], a member of the Committee on Agriculture, has criticized this House for not taking action upon the President's recommendations sooner. He stated that we have accomplished nothing. If the gentleman will bear in mind all the things left undone by the Democratic Party when it was in control of the House and all the things done by that party that will have to be done over; if he will have patience with this side; if he will consider the tremendous task which the Republican Party has before it; if he will consider what the Agricultural Committee—of which he is an honored and valuable member—has had before it and what has already been accomplished by it, first, the $33,000,000 Agricultural appropriation act for the present year, containing so much new legislation thought wise to incorporate in it, as, for instance, the repeal of the absurd so-called daylight-saving law; the clause requiring the marking of the net weight on wrapped hams and bacon; the clause requiring the inspection and marking of horse meat; the amendment to the United States warehouse act; the extension of the Weeks Act; the authorization for agricultural exhibits at State, interstate, and international fairs; the provisions for the enforcement of Government regulations for handling the wool clip of 1918; and numerous other important provisions, all of which were carried in the Agricultural appropriation bill and passed by the House, and thus have already been disposed of this session.

Now, the Committee on Agriculture brings in this bill to correct another error in Democratic legislation.

Furthermore, as the gentleman knows, the Committee on Agriculture has been holding hearings for the past 10 days on the "high cost of living" and on "cold-storage legislation," so there seems to be no cause for alarm that nothing is being done by this side. Rest assured that the blunders made in Democratic legislation will, from time to time, be corrected, but also bear in mind the correction of the multitude of sins committed will require time.

The gentlemen from Texas [Mr. YOUNG] and from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] have stated that in this bill we have accepted the recommendations identically as suggested by the President and the Attorney General. I am sure the gentlemen will withdraw that statement, especially as one is a member of the Committee on Agriculture and the other appeared before the committee in connection with this legislation. They surely must be familiar with the recommendations and with the provisions of this bill.

The suggestion of the Attorney General was to add a penalty clause to section 4, to penalize the farmer and the retailer.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. He did not say anything of the kind. He said he had no objection to that.

Mr. HAUGEN. I am referring to the recommendations.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. When his attention was called to it he did not object to it in the bill he had prepared.

Mr. HAUGEN. The recommendation of the Attorney General was to impose a penalty not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both, upon a farmer agreeing with any other person to limit the facilities for harvesting. Hence, if the recommendation of the Attorney General had been carried out, if the farmer should agree or arrange with his neighbor to limit the facilities for harvesting he could have been fined not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both. The other provision which the Attorney General proposed to include by attaching a penalty to section 4 would have made the farmer subject to the same fine and penalty for making any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with his farm products. That was the suggestion by the Attorney General. Still you say this bill comes to the House the same as recommended by the Attorney General. No; we have exempted the farmer.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Will the gentleman yield further and let me read what the Attorney General says?

Mr. HAUGEN. Read the message of the President.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas (reading)—

If the committee wants to exempt all of these farmers and all their associations and corporations it may not make the act unworkable.

I was going to read what he said. He said he had no objection——

Mr. HAUGEN. I will read the Attorney General's letter.

If you will turn to page 1 of the hearings, you will find his letter to the chairman, which reads:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., August 12, 1919.

Hon. GILBERT N. HAUGEN,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HAUGEN: I beg to inclose herewith draft of an act to amend the food-control act so as to enlarge the definition of "necessaries" and to provide a penalty for the unlawful acts described in section 4 thereof.

The only changes in existing law made by this draft are the addition of the words in italics. They have the effect of adding "wearing apparel" and "the containers in which foods, feeds, and fertilizers are sold" to the list of articles described in the act as "necessaries." The only other amendment is indicated on page 3, where a penalty is added to section 4 of the food-control act.

It will be extremely helpful in our effort to reduce the high cost of living if these amendments to the food-control act can be promptly passed.

Yours, truly, A. MITCHEL PALMER,
Attorney General.

I will also read section 4 of the food-control act to show the gentlemen to what the Attorney General desires a penalty attached:

SEC. 4. That it is hereby made unlawful for any person willfully to destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof; knowingly to commit waste or willfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in or in connection with their production, manufacture, or distribution; to hoard, as defined in section 6 of this act, any necessaries; to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any necessaries; to engage in any discriminatory and unfair or any deceptive or wasteful practice or device, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries; to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person, (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict distribution of any necessaries; (d) to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof; or (e) to exact excessive prices for any necessaries, or to aid or abet the doing of any act made unlawful by this section.

The draft recommended by the Attorney General, adding a penalty to section 4, which would, if enacted into law, provide a maximum penalty of $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both, for any farmer or for any retailer, even though the retailer's gross sales did not exceed $100,000 per annum, who made an unjust or unreasonable rate of charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessary, from which the farmer and retailer are now both exempt under section 5—the license section of the act. Section 5 provides a penalty for profiteering, except as to farmers and retailers doing a business of less than $100,000 a year, notwithstanding statements to the contrary. It authorizes the President to issue licenses and provides that whenever the President shall find that any storage charge, commission, profit, or practice of any licensee is unjust or unreasonable, or discriminatory and unfair, or wasteful, the President may order such licensee to discontinue the same and may also in lieu of any such unjust and unfair charge, commission, profit, or practice find what is a just, reasonable, nondiscriminatory and fair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice. Hence there can be no question but that the President now has the power to fix prices.

As to the contention that—while the act prohibits profiteering, the prohibition is accompanied by no penalty—

Section 5 of the act reads, further:

Any person who without a license issued pursuant to this section (sec. 5), or whose license shall have been revoked, knowingly engages in or carries on any business for which a license is required under this section, or willfully fails or refuses to discontinue any unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, in accordance with the requirement of an order issued under this section, or any regulation prescribed under this section, shall upon conviction thereof be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

If that does not provide a penalty for profiteering, will some one tell me what it does mean?

The exemptions under section 5 extended to the farmer and the retailer read:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, cooperative association of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, or other persons with respect to products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him * * *: Provided further, That for the purposes of this act a retailer shall be deemed to be a person, copartnership, firm, corporation, or association not engaging in the wholesale business whose gross sales do not exceed $100,000 per annum.

As before stated, the adding of the penalty clause to section 4 makes all persons liable to a maximum penalty of $5,000 fine or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both, for profiteering. It would exempt no one. But, as stated, that is not all. The same penalty would apply to "conspiring, combining, agreeing, or arranging with any other person to limit the facilities for harvesting." As the law stands to-day, there is no penalty for agreeing or arranging to limit the facilities for harvesting, hence adding a penalty to section 4 without exempting the farmer would, under section 4, make the farmer making such agreement liable to a maximum penalty of $5,000 fine or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

So if a farmer should agree with his neighbor during harvest to take a day off or to help him butcher a hog, he might be liable to a maximum penalty of $5,000 fine or to imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

As to hoarding, section 4, with the penalty attached, would also provide a maximum penalty of $5,000 fine or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both, for withholding the products of his farm, which he now has a right to do.

Section 6 exempts the farmer with respect to the accumulating or withholding of the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him which is not deemed to be hoarding within the meaning of the section, but not so with section 4, with the penalty attached, if he is not exempted.

The Clayton law exempts farmers and labor in certain respects. Sections 6 to 20 of the Clayton law are quoted, as follows:

SEC. 6. That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof, nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

SEC. 20. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employer and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons, whether singly or in concert, from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do, or from attending at any place where any such person or persons may lawfully be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or from peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working, or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful and lawful means so to do, or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value, or from peaceably assembling in a lawful manner and for lawful purposes, or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto; nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held to be violations of any law of the United States.

If the recommendation of the Attorney General had been carried out the farmer convicted of hoarding or arranging with any person to limit the facilities for harvesting, or making any unjust or unreasonable rate of charge for farm products produced or raised upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by him, would have been subject to a fine not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both. This bill now reported by the Committee on Agriculture exempts the farmer, in that no penalty is provided as against the farmer in this bill. It is believed that the farmer should be permitted to dispose of the products of his labor the same as other laborers are permitted to do.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. Did the Attorney General really mean to put the farmer in the penitentiary or fine him $5,000?

Mr. HAUGEN. He recommended attaching that penalty to section 4 without exempting the farmer.

Mr. QUIN. I am very proud that you gentlemen did not follow any such advice.

Mr. HAUGEN. We did not follow it. This bill provides for the exemption. We give the farmer the same exemption given the laborer in the Clayton Act, the same exemption given the farmer in the Clayton Act, the same exemption given the farmer in the food-control act as it now stands.

As to the question "Did the Attorney General mean to put the farmer in the penitentiary?" Not being a mind reader I am unable to say, but knowing the Attorney General as I do, having the highest regard for him, and recalling his distinguished service in this House, I, of course, feel certain that he would not do anything to embarrass or penalize any person pursuing his line of activity in an honorable way. But the Attorney General personally can not control or be held responsible for the hundreds, yes, thousands, of attorneys and agents under him. So the question is not what the Attorney General may have meant to do, but what might happen. What is the situation? What has taken place? What would be likely to take place? I refer you to the statements made by representatives of farm organizations before the Committee on Agriculture, printed in the hearings on "the high cost of living" before the committee on August 15, 1919. I will not take time to read statements by Mr. Miller and Mr. Ingersoll, but merely incorporate them in my remarks.

Extracts from statement of Mr. John D. Miller, New York City, representing the National Board of Farm Organizations, in hearings held on the high cost of living before the House Committee on Agriculture, August 15, 1919.

Mr. MILLER. My name is John D. Miller, and my business is located at 303 Fifth Avenue, New York City, which is the office of our farm organizations.

I appear here, Mr. Chairman, as representing the National Board of Farm Organizations, having affiliated with it about 2,000,000 of the organized farmers of America.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Chairman, as emphasizing the importance of having a clear right, a right that will be unchallenged, to make these collective sales, I am going to ask you to let me take a few minutes to tell you a story of things that have been done in the immediate past. The story will take you from California to New York. I am going to try to tell this story dispassionately; I am not going to express opinions on it, but will ask you to characterize it as, in your better judgment, you think it deserves, and if any remedy is needed that you will know what remedy.

If you find from the story that I tell you that there is any concert of action between the organized middlemen of this country and certain officials of our State departments of justice—for in this story you will find figuring milk dealers, organized middlemen; you will find State prosecuting attorneys, and in one or two instances Federal district attorneys—we are going to ask you to decide what these facts mean.

In June the organized farmers of California engaged in the business of making collective sales of their milk were arrested. The sensational newspapers of California branded them as criminals. They were indicted—for what? Not for profiteering; oh, no; but for simply making collective sales of farm products.

Mr. YOUNG. Was that in the State or the Federal courts?

Mr. MILLER. That was in the State courts, under the State law. They were tried, and on the 31st day of July were promptly acquitted. But that was an expensive trial. Farmers can not afford to be continually and perpetualiy fighting lawsuits to justify their right or defend their right to make collective sales. A few such victories will bankrupt that organization.

Let us next go to Chicago. In the fall of 1917 the organized farmers that supplied the Chicago district with milk were indicted. The investigations which led up to those indictments were oppressive in their character. They were indicted as having violated the State antitrust law.

About that time it became necessary, however, for Mr. Hoover, our able Food Administrator, to deal with farm organizations, and, where they were not organized, to see that they were, in order to help in the solving of the great and important problems with which he was wrestling.

And so this very organization in Chicago was called to his assistance. Well, they soon saw that it would be ironical to be trying those men over on Fifteenth Street for committing acts which, at the very time of the trial, over on Fourteenth Street they were doing with the acquiescence, by the consent, and with the cooperation of the Federal Food Administration. So the prosecution of the indictment under the State laws was postponed.

After the armistice, however, it was revived, and they commenced to get ready for trial. It was postponed from time to time for reasons which it is not necessary here to relate, and it is now fixed for the 15th of September.

In April, however, it was thought that that indictment would come on for trial in May; and by a method which seems to be largely peculiar to the city of Chicago and the city of New York, in order that those men, accused of having the temerity of agreeing with their fellow farmers as to the sales of their milk, there emanated from the office of the State district attorney columns of interviews in the newspapers to the effect that they were going after those men—all of this, of course, in order that the prospective jurors who were to try that case might have full knowledge in advance of the iniquities of these accused men and might at the trial be prepared to do them exact justice.

And by what, I am sure, was a coincidence, just at that time, in April, the Federal district attorney of that district got busy and commenced investigations of the same men under the Federal antitrust act.

Mr. YOUNG. Under the Sherman law?

Mr. MILLER. Under the Sherman law; yes, sir; the Sherman and Clayton laws. The method of that I am going to relate to you; I am going to try to relate it dispassionately, and it is for you to characterize it.

At a given hour on a given day, say, 10 o'clock in the forenoon, there appeared in the office of the secretary of that farmers' organization two of the special agents—detectives, we assume—with a subpœna duces tecum, commanding them to appear forthwith before the Federal grand jury.

* * * * * * *

A subpœna duces tecum was served commanding them to bring forthwith a large volume of their records, books, and papers. At the same hour two sleuths appeared at the office of the president of the organization in the same building with a like subpœna.

* * * * * * *

Now, that was very carefully staged, for, at the same hour of the same day, at about 35 points in that great territory supplying Chicago with milk, the special agents subpœnaed the local officers of the local associations with a subpœna duces tecum to proceed forthwith to Chicago with all of the books, correspondence, and records in their possession.

* * * * * * *

Now, I am going to tell you one way in which what in police circles is sometimes called the "third degree" was applied. One of these men was taken to an upper room where two of the detectives were. They were questioning this man in regard to everything connected with the matter and many things not connected with it. By and by one of them, with a significant look at that farmer sitting there, with some ostentation pulled a revolver out of his pocket and laid it on the desk. He went on asking questions, and the man answered them the best he could. By and by the detective took the revolver up again, twirled the cylinder—twisted it around, or something like that. Does this make you nervous? No; that was not in Russia; it was in Chicago.

You can characterize that as you think best; I am not going to do so.

Let us go on to Ohio. As I told you at the beginning, this thing is extending from San Francisco to the Atlantic Ocean. In Ohio last week the officers of the farmers' milk-selling organization were indicted—not for profiteering, but for fixing prices and making collective sales. There was no claim that the price was too high; there can not be.

Mr. YOUNG. Was that under the State or the National law in Ohio?

Mr. MILLER. Under State law. Some of these gentlemen who were indicted learned of it by telephone message along the course of the evening. They telephoned the sheriff: "We hear we are indicted; we will be there in the morning and give bail." "All right," the sheriff said. "I am sorry that the deputies have already started to arrest you, but when they get there you tell them what I say, that you can come in to-morrow and give bail." Because the sheriff knew every one of those men; he knew they would never be fugitives from justice; every one of them was a man of repute in his locality; they were men of standing, occupying high positions in their localities, and sometimes holding positions of trust and confidence in their communities.

But when the deputy sheriffs came back and reported to the district attorney, he started them off again, late at night, in automobiles; and they went around over the country in automobiles, and reached some of the men in the middle of the night.

Those men finally reached the jail at Cleveland at 4 o'clock in the morning. They were taken into the warden's office; they were searched, and their personal belongings in their pockets were taken. One of them, Mr. Ingersoll, who is present here this morning, called the warden's attention to this. He said, "Mr. Warden, that bunch of keys that you are taking are the keys of the bank." Mr. Ingersoll is vice president of the local bank. He said, "Those are important keys, necessary to the bank." But they were all taken, nevertheless.

They thought they would spare these criminals the ignominy of placing them in cells, and they were told that they might have the use of a hospital ward. They were put into a hospital ward reeking with vermin. In the morning they had breakfast brought in that, both from its quality and from the containers in which it was brought, they could not taste or touch.

While they were there a photographer was introduced into the jail to take the pictures of these criminals in jail. They protested against the indignity; but it was insisted upon; and so they turned their backs and the photographer got an elegant view of the back of the heads of each one of those gentlemen.

Now, they were prepared early in the morning, as soon as they could reach their friends, to give bail; they could give any quantity of bail that might be required. It was not convenient, however, for the district attorney to arrange for bail to be taken until about noon.

They were kept in jail until about noon, and then taken into the courthouse; there they had to wait about half an hour or more—and if I am not stating the facts correctly, Mr. Ingersoll will correct me. There a photographer came into the court room and took a picture of the judge sitting on the bench with those six or seven men lined up in the prisoners' dock. They then gave bail.

Mr. Chairman, these men were not accused of murder, or bomb throwing, or anarchy, or treason. This did not happen in Russia or in the Middle Ages. These men were simply accused of combining with their fellow farmers to make collective sales of their milk.

Again, I am not going to express any opinion, but will ask you to characterize it.

Let us now turn to New York City, where we reach the Atlantic coast, and then I will take no more of your time upon this subject:

In January, 1918, under a State law, the officers of the farmers' organizaton there were indicted. The State law which it was claimed they had violated was the antitrust law and the penal code containing the same provisions. There were no acts of oppression or intimidation in the arrest of those men; they were treated courteously.

They gave bail. Incidentally it cost them—as soon as they found that they were indicted they sent to a surety company to look up these seven men and be ready to go their bail. Well, they did it; incidentally it cost the association two or three hundred dollars premium to the surety company. But that is a mere bagatelle; it cost them $15,000 to fight their way out of the trouble.

They immediately asked for a change of venue. That was refused by the Chicago people. But the judge in New York at once discovered that it would be almost a travesty upon justice to try those farmers brought in from the country charged with fixing milk prices—to have them tried by a jury of men buying that milk and consuming it in a city; and he very promptly directed a change of venue to up the State. They did not take the case to a dairying county or an agricultural county, but to a mixed county—Oneida County, in which the city of Utica is located, which is one of the largest up-State cities; a city which has a larger population than the rest of the county, and larger than any agricultural county.

The legislature was convened. The matter was called to their attention, and they immediately passed a law amending the antitrust law and the penal code of the State so as to permit collective bargaining by farmers. Thereupon the district attorney caused these indictments to be dismissed, stating as a reason that the law having been amended the farmers had a clear right under the State law to do what they were doing.

* * * * * * *

About the 1st of December last, however, a milk investigation was commenced in the office of the district attorney. Subpœnas were issued from time to time to the officers, clerks, and employees of this farm organization, commanding them to bring down to the district attorney large numbers of records, papers, minute books, checks, vouchers, expense accounts, and correspondence. More and more were called for from time to time; and they were held several months, although a part of them were material, or, at least, would have been very convenient to have in the office.

* * * * * * *

If we grant clearly their right to compel the production of those papers and to hold them, beyond all question the only purpose for which they should be used is in judicial proceedings. What has been done? They have been turned over to a sensational newspaper in New York City, photographed, and last week there appeared an article under a heading—I am not sure I remember the exact wording; but, anyhow, it was something about "The dairymen's league branch of the milk trust," and these checks, vouchers, telegrams, and letters are printed. Down under that is a picture of an emaciated baby and the words, "The victim."

The district attorney, if he is quoted correctly by the newspapers, has stated repeatedly during this investigation since last December that the dairymen's league had succeeded in obtaining a law which shielded them under the State law, but that they could still get them under the Federal law. We have heard nothing that indicates that the Federal district attorney in that State is investigating it at all; we do not know whether he is or not, but we have not heard that he is.

[Extracts from the statement of Mr. H. W. Ingersoll, of Elyria, Ohio, president Ohio State Dairy Association.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Chairman, I have been asked to say a word, and I want to say first that I appreciate very much the opportunity to be heard on this matter.

I am one of the men who was indicted, as Mr. Miller has told you. What I say to you I say from personal experience. We have an organization known as the Ohio Farmers' Cooperative Milk Co., which is composed of farmers producing milk and delivering it in Cleveland, Ohio. We do not control 65 per cent of the milk that goes into the city. We have been meeting from time to time and laying before the various dealers the conditions under which we were producing milk, and we have asked them to advance our price. During the month of July we got 7½ cents a quart for milk, and it was sold in the city at 15 cents a quart. In August we have conditions which were so changed that we were compelled to pay about $25 a ton or more for all varieties of feed, and we have been paying as high as $100 a ton for oil meal.

About the 1st of August the wave of cutting down of the high cost of living spread over the country, and a special grand jury in Cuyahoga County, Ohio, was convened, and at that meeting some of the dealers appeared, and the producers' executive committee, of which I am chairman, were indicted. This news was spread abroad over the wires, and I at once got in communication with the sheriff and suggested that it was a physical impossibility to get in there on that day, and said that we would report at 9 o'clock the next morning, and I would see that all of the indicted men were present in his office. Deputies were sent out and notified us, and returned to the city without action except to notify us that we were wanted in the morning.

The deputy went back to his office in Cleveland, the one who gathered up four of us who lived west of Cleveland, and, as he expressed it, he got the most severe bawling out he ever got because he did not bring the prisoners in. He started back and called up Mr. Clark, in Medina County, about midnight, and he was caused to leave his family; and he came on and took one of the other men, and then he came on to Elyria, where I was taken, and we were all taken to Cleveland about half past 4 o'clock in the morning into what was known as the hospital ward of the jail, and there the conditions were certainly deplorable; and there were vermin in there and also insane, and we were associated with them. We were there from about half past 4 in the morning, the four I was taken in with; the other three were taken in there about half past 2 in the morning. We remained there until about half past 10 or 11 o'clock. Then, through the assistance of an attorney, we were allowed to be taken before the judge and allowed to give bail and came out.

These men, two or three of them, came from east of Cleveland, and they were taken out of the fields at 4 o'clock in the morning, and they are men of exemplary character, some of them township trustees, and holding other positions of trust, and they were taken to the city and not permitted to have food that night, and did not get anything until they got out the next day.

The families of all these men indicted and brought of course were heartbroken. We had one man, a county commissioner elect, taking his office in September. We had a deputy sheriff of the county and court bailiff, and that shows the character of the men.

The result is that the producers in that vicinity are simply up in arms, and I want to say right here that the rank and file of the producers are continuing to furnish their milk to the city of Cleveland, and the inhabitants of Cleveland as a class are not opposed to our organization or its workings.

We have never had costs of production at any time, and according to the best evidence we can get, according to the records that have been kept by our own producers, we are not getting them now. We did ask an advance for that reason and we have been indicted.

If you will turn to the hearings on cold-storage legislation now pending before our committee, you will find that exhaustive investigations on profiteering have been made. Several New Jersey cities decided to go into the milk business in order to furnish cheaper milk. Milk was being sold as high as 20 cents a quart. The farmer was getting 7 of the 20 cents. The municipalities bought the milk at 7 cents and sold it at 11 cents. It resulted in the retailers reducing their prices to 16 and 18 cents a quart. A delegation of mayors appeared before the committee. I will quote from Mayor Gillen's testimony:

The CHAIRMAN. You said you purchased milk at 7 cents; where was it delivered?

Mr. GILLEN. Delivered at the creamery in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any profiteering so far in that, or do you consider the price charged by the farmer fair and reasonable?

Mr. GILLEN. I think at the present time that price could not be reduced very much.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, so far there is no profiteering in that. What is the fair and reasonable price for which milk should be sold in your city?

Mr. GILLEN. I think it ought to be sold at 14 cents a quart.

The CHAIRMAN. That would give a fair profit to the dealer?

Mr. GILLEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any complaint that he is receiving more than a reasonable profit?

Mr. GILLEN I am not complaining about the farmer; I am complaining of the highway robber that is coming in between the farmer and me.

If you will turn to the President's message, the statement of the Attorney General, or the testimony recorded in the hearings, you will find no evidence as to the farmer hoarding, profiteering in farm products produced or raised upon his farm, or limiting the facilities for harvesting. You will find that the farmers have not only been prosecuted but persecuted. I take it that no fair-minded person will stand for such treatment. Certainly not after we have been to the enormous expense and sacrifice of stamping out autocracy and persecution in other sections of the world.

If the purpose of the Attorney General is to lower the high cost of living, I suggest that the profiteers already shown to be responsible for the high cost of living be prosecuted instead of enacting laws making it possible to prosecute those against whom no charge has been preferred. What is the situation? Who is guilty of profiteering? Who, if any, should be punished? Exhaustive investigations have been ordered and reports have been made. As before stated, there is no evidence of the farmer profiteering. According to the statement of Dr. Spillman, formerly Chief of the Office of Farm Management of the Department of Agriculture, before the committee on February 15, 1916, page 29, the farmer receives, on an average, only $402 in food, fuel, rent, and cash for his year's labor, which includes the services of his family, composed on an average of 4.6 persons. That statement was made some time ago, and of course the farmer is now receiving more. A more recent report is found in Bulletin No. 300, of March, 1919. The results of a survey of 60 farms are summarized in this table. The five-year average reports:

Farm area ---------- acres	148
Crop area ---------- do	80.7
Months of labor	22.5
Number of cows	16.9
Number of brood sows	6.9
Number of work horses	4.7
Investment	$17,692
Receipts	$2,300
Expense	$1,007

Deducting from the receipts the expenses and interest at 5 per cent on the investment, or $885, he receives $408. The report reads:

This gives none too cheerful an outlook for the farmer; even with such high prices as those of 1916 and 1917, the average labor income for the five years stands at $408. Who would count this too high? But who will guarantee the farmer as good an average for the next five years?

This county is one of the richest and most productive counties in the State, populated by intelligent and industrious people.

In addition to the $408 received by the farmer, his family is credited with receiving $211, which brings the total to $619 for the year's labor of himself and family. This is $217 more than found by Dr. Spillman a few years ago.

Here we have Government reports indicating in a measure the income of the farmer. As you will recall, the farmer was the only one to suffer from interference by Government regulation. He was made to sell his wheat for $2, when if left to the law of supply and demand he would have received $4, or, as Mr. Hoover indicated, probably $7, a bushel. Besides this, the ratio of corn and hogs was fixed at 13 bushels of corn to make 100 pounds of hog. When corn was selling at $2 a bushel, or $26 for 13 bushels, the price of hogs was $15.50. The farmer certainly was not benefited by the price fixed. Now, when the farmer is harvesting and selling his crop, comes the drive to reduce prices, under the pretext of lowering the high cost of living. Judging from results attained under Government regulations, the farmer will receive less and the packing and milling trusts will grow fat. The consumer will bow to the inevitable and pay the increased price. The farmer also suffered by the absurd so-called daylight-saving law, which caused him so much inconvenience and expense. I also wish to call attention to the President's message, page 6, which reads:

Wheat shipments and credits to facilitate the purchase of our wheat can and will be limited and controlled in such a way as not to raise, but rather to lower, the price of flour here. The Government has the power, within certain limits, to regulate that. * * * The price of wheat is lower in the United States than in Europe and can with proper management be kept so.

In view of the Government reports, statements made by the Attorney General and representatives of farm organizations, and what is stated in the President's message, will anyone seriously contend that the farmers should be denied the right to dispose of the products of their farms as they may see fit to do and as they are now permitted to do under the food-control and antitrust acts? Will anyone contend that large appropriations should be made to run down the farmer receiving less than $500 for his year's labor, when practically no attention has been given to those increasing their profits by hundreds of millions?

On July 3, 1918, in response to the President's direction to the Federal Trade Commission to investigate and report facts relating to the production, ownership, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foodstuffs and the by-products and to ascertain the facts bearing on alleged violations of the antitrust act, the commission reported, as printed on page 11995 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 3, 1918, as follows:

Answering directly your question as to whether or not there exist "monopolies, controls, trusts, combinations, conspiracies, or restraints of trade out of harmony with the law and the public interest," we have found conclusive evidence that warrants an unqualified affirmative. * * *

It appears that five great packing concerns of the country—Swift, Armour, Morris, Cudahy, and Wilson—have attained such a dominant position that they control at will the market in which they buy their supplies, the market in which they sell their products, and hold the fortunes of their competitors in their hands. * * *

The combination has not stopped at the most minute integration, but has gone on into a stage of conglomeration, so that unrelated heterogeneous enterprises are brought under control. * * *

If these five great concerns owned no packing plants and killed no cattle and still retained control of the instruments of transportation, of marketing, and of storage, their position would not be less strong than it is. * * *

The producer of live stock is at the mercy of these five great companies, because they control the market and the marketing facilities, and, to some extent, the rolling stock which transports the products to the market.

The competitors of these five concerns are at their mercy because of the control of the market prices, storage facilities, and the refrigerator cars for distribution.

The consumer of meat products is at the mercy of these five because both producer and competitor are helpless to bring relief.

On June 29, 1918, the Federal Trade Commission, in response to Senate resolution of June 10, 1918, transmitted a report (Doc. 248, 65th Cong., 2d sess.) containing facts, figures, data, and information then in possession of the commission relative to profiteering. On page 7 it shows that—

Five meat packers—Armour, Swift, Morris, Wilson, and Cudahy—and their subsidiary and affiliated companies have monopolistic control of the meat industry and are reaching for like domination in other products. Their manipulations of the market embrace every device that is useful to them, without regard to law. Their reward, expressed in terms of profit, reveals that four of these concerns have pocketed in 1915, 1916, and 1917 $140,000,000. However delicate a definition is framed for "profiteering," these packers have preyed upon the people unconscionably. They are soon to come under further governmental regulation approved by Executive order.

On page 14 it states that—

Of the astounding figure of $140,000,000, $121,000,000 represents excess over their prewar profit, and that the profit taken by Morris & Co. for the fiscal year ending November 1, 1917, is equal to 263.7 per cent on its $3,000,000 outstanding capital stock.

The report refers to a number of evil practices—the padding of accounts, the paying of extraordinary salaries, as, for example, those paid by the American Metal Co. (Ltd.), of New York, the chief dealings of which are in zinc, where Mr. C. M. Loeb, president, received in 1917, $364,326.72; Otto Sussman, vice president, $221,596.04; J. Loeb, vice president, $147,930.69; and so forth.

On page 17 of the report, referring to flour millers, it states that in place of the 25 cents per barrel maximum by regulation, the average profit per barrel on 4,000,000 barrels, from September, 1917, to March, 1918, was about 45 cents, or over three times the normal profit per barrel for the four years ending June 30, 1916, reported to be only 13½ cents on each barrel.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] called attention to one miller in Kansas who made $282,000 profit in excess of the maximum profit fixed by the Government regulations. The claim was settled for $8,000. Another miller made $19,000. He settled for $402. Both claims were settled without reauditing the accounts. And now, two years after the approval of the food-control act containing section 5, under which the millers were licensed, and which contains a penalty of not exceeding $5,000 fine or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both—now, 13 months after the information was furnished, Congress is advised that "although the present food-control act prohibits profiteering, the prohibition is accompanied by no penalty."

We have departments asking Congress to increase appropriations, for what? To send special agents over the country to locate profiteers. You have the information. Still you are endeavoring to find some farmer who, according to Government report, receives $402 a year, and to make it possible to fine him $5,000 or imprison him for two years, or both. Gentlemen, if you are going to reduce the cost of living, then go after the profiteers whom you have already found and who you know have made millions by profiteering. Instead of compromising fines, collect them. Imprison those whom you have already convicted or concerning whom you have sufficient information to convict. You know who they are. You have the report of the Federal Trade Commission. They have been pointed out. The commission has told you who the profiteers are, and it has told you what their practices are, and still you are asking for additional appropriations which will give a soft berth in the public crib to a number of deserving Democrats under the pretense of looking for the profiteer.

Mr. KNUTSON. How long has the gentleman been a member of the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. HAUGEN. About 20 years.

Mr. KNUTSON. How long a time intervened between the inauguration of Woodrow Wilson in 1913 and the time the administration asked for legislation to curb the profiteer?

Mr. HAUGEN. I am glad the gentleman has brought that up. We can not forget the history of this legislation. The department suggested legislation, true enough.

The department's first proposition, section 16, provided for a lump-sum appropriation of $25,000,000, to be immediately available. The bill was referred back to the department with instructions to itemize. The department came back with House bill 4125, introduced by Mr. Lever on May 3, 1917, containing section 2, which made it unlawful for any person to hoard or to hold or to enter into any contract or arrangement for any necessary in excess of an amount reasonably needed, and so forth. The apparent aim of this section was to do away with evil speculation and manipulations, but no penalties were provided for. Of course, without a penalty clause it is even satisfactory to the gamblers. The committee amended the bill by inserting a penalty clause. The bill was reported. At the request of the department the bill was recalled, and House bill 4188, of May 7, 1917, was reported without the section making evil speculation and manipulations unlawful, and the appropriation was cut to $18,510,000.

The absurdity of the whole proposition was pointed out. The agricultural papers and people in general commented. It was suggested that rather than appropriate $18,000,000 to employ 11,000 people to travel over the country telling farmers how to farm, it might be better to put the 11,000 behind a plow; that the department could better furnish tractors and sulky plows to ride instead of automobiles for its agents, but the appropriation was made. Five thousand four hundred people were sent out under the supervision of the States Relations Service. Besides a large number of persons employed by other bureaus of the department were also sent out over the country. Two thousand employees of the Department of Agriculture were certified by the Secretary for deferred classification from military service.

We had the food-control bill up on the floor of the House for several days. An effort was made to add boots, shoes, and clothing to the list of necessaries. We were ruled out on points of order. The bill went over to the Senate at the other end of the Capitol, where it was enlarged. As the result of months of work we have the present law. Now comes the Attorney General, who suggests that we amend the bill by adding wearing apparel and the container in which foods, feed, and fertilizer are sold, the very things for which we were contending when the act was first passed.

Mr. WELTY. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the original law did not contain any penalty clause?

Mr. HAUGEN. As suggested by the department, it did not.

Mr. WELTY. Was not the gentleman from Iowa a member of that committee in the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mr. HAUGEN. I was a member of the committee during that Congress, and I take some credit for putting the penalty clause in the bill. We fought for it for two weeks.

Mr. WELTY. The gentleman suggested the penalty clause?

Mr. HAUGEN. I did; we made a fight for it both in the committee and on the floor.

Mr. WELTY. And the opposition was on the floor of the House?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. WELTY. It was taken out of the bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. The bill was reported by the committee. The bill was recalled by the department and another bill submitted to the committee.

Mr. WELTY. Did the gentleman suggest a penalty clause after that?

Mr. HAUGEN. I did; and it went in.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for information. I am not acquainted at all with the provisions of the previous act, and what I would like to know is this: What power lies in this section to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries? Is it your opinion——

Mr. HAUGEN. For profit?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes. I want to ask the gentleman this question: In his judgment, does he believe that with that provision the Attorney General of the United States would be able to meet the proposition of the gentleman who stated that cabbage in his town was grown by the farmer for 1 cent a pound and charged by the retailer at 6 cents a pound?

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, my friend, they are reaching the farmer and retailer now. If the gentleman will read the hearings——

Mr. LAYTON. Would that enable a legal prosecution in case you could find that the farmer was holding his cabbage for 1 cent a pound and the retailer was selling it for 6 cents?

Mr. HAUGEN. Under the present bill the farmers are exempt. We propose to exempt them here in respect to products of the farm, as they are under the Clayton Act.

Mr. LAYTON. I mean the middleman.

Mr. HAUGEN. The retailer. A retailer doing business of less than $100,000 is exempt under section 5, but not in this bill. Why? The profits of a retail dealer doing $5,000, $10,000, or $50,000 business per year are small as compared with those making hundreds of millions of profits.

Mr. EMERSON. And he, most of all, who does less than $100,000——

Mr. HAUGEN. The exemption was increased to $100,000 under the food-control act.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will.

Mr. ELSTON. Now, the gentleman said here that he has exempted the farmer from the penalties of section 4.

Mr. HAUGEN. Exactly.

Mr. ELSTON. And on a parallel with the exemptions that have heretofore been made to labor organizations——

Mr. HAUGEN. As to collective bargaining, in so far as it applies to the products of his farm.

Mr. ELSTON. This goes further than the matter of collective bargaining. All you said in here is this, that the provisions of this section 4 shall not be construed to forbid farmers from organizing and indulging in collective bargaining.

Mr. HAUGEN. Exactly; as to products from their farms.

Mr. ELSTON. Now you have gone further, and you say that the farmer may do all the things in section 4 that are prescribed against every other citizen of the United States.

Mr. HAUGEN. The farmer may do them with respect to the products of his own farm.

Mr. ELSTON. No, sir. You say, with respect to products of the soil on the farm, he may destroy, commit waste, he may hoard, he may monopolize, he may limit, and so on down the line. Now, why do you carry it so far—the products of the farm?

Mr. HAUGEN. They are the products of his own farm—raised by him—and surely he should have a right to do as he pleases with the products of his own farm, of his own labor, the right that he now possesses.

Mr. ELSTON. Now, do you mean to say that in addition to exempting him now from any inhibition in regard to association and collective bargaining, you permit him to do every unlawful act that you prescribe against every other citizen of the United States?

Mr. HAUGEN. We propose to let him continue to do anything he pleases with his own products, the products of his labor; that is what labor is exempted from.

Mr. ELSTON. He may hoard, he may destroy, he may waste——

Mr. HAUGEN. In so far as the products are produced or raised upon his farm.

In section 2 of the bill under consideration, which attaches to section 4 of the food-control act the penalty recommended by the Attorney General, the following proviso is added:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, horticulturist, vineyardist, planter, ranchman, dairyman, stockman, or other agriculturist, with respect to the farm products produced or raised upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by him: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to forbid or make unlawful collective bargaining by any cooperative association or other association of farmers, dairymen, gardeners, or other producers of farm products with respect to the farm products produced or raised by its members upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by them.

I believe the language of the provisos clearly shows the intention of the committee.

Much has been said about the present high cost of living and its causes.

All agree that profiteering is one of the causes. If so, why spend time and money in prosecuting the farmer, who is not shown to be profiteering but who has been deprived of making profits? Why embarrass or try to prosecute him? Why wait 13 long months before commencing action against those reported by the Federal Trade Commission to be guilty of "embracing every device that is useful to them without regard to law," who have preyed upon the people unconscionably, whose profits have reached astounding figures? Now that they have been located for 13 months and the cause is known, why appropriate additional sums of money for the employment of attorneys and agents, or enact laws to embarrass those who come here with a clean bill of health? Rather than jail the farmers we had better encourage them to continue production. We will need every bushel produced. Can there be any question as to that? We know that about 40,000,000 participated in the war. Switching that number of people from their usual lines of activity—from farming, manufacturing, mining, milling, and various other industries—to the field of battle, thus transferring them from the field of production to that of consumption and destruction, it goes without saying that with the cessation of their former activities and the resulting increase of consumption and destruction, with the farmer consuming instead of producing, with the manufacturer manufacturing steel for guns instead of steel for local construction, naturally the world finds its bins swept clean and its warehouses empty.

In order to keep the people of the world from starving we loaned Europe approximately $10,000,000,000, all of it used to buy products from our farms and factories. As a result our exports of breadstuffs have increased from $165,000,000 in 1914 to $954,000,000 in 1919, the total export of all foodstuffs from $430,713,457 in 1914 to $2,504,895,554 in 1919. That, in part, explains the present scarcity, and practically all agree that scarcity is one of the causes of the high cost of living.

Increased cost of production and increased cost of living go hand in hand. Labor is one element of cost. Increase in wages adds to the increase of cost of farm products, their transportation, marketing, and distribution. So whenever the laborer receives an increase in wages he receives an increased price list quoting higher prices on shoes, clothing, rent, and foods which he must buy. A few years ago, for instance, potatoes, bread, and butter were usually served without charge with an order of steak. The farmer then received for his potatoes, wheat, and butter about half what he receives now; he at that time received about $1 a bushel for wheat; he now receives $2 a bushel. Four and one-half bushels of wheat make a barrel of flour. The farmer now receives $9 for the 4½ bushels of wheat. The wheat goes to the miller, who sells the middlings and bran back to the farmer for $2, leaving the farmer $7. The flour is sold to the baker, who makes it into five hundred and eighty-seven 8-ounce loaves of bread, and in turn sells it to the hotel keeper at 8 cents a loaf. The hotel keeper cuts each loaf of bread into 10 slices and serves 2 slices to each guest for 20 cents. So the hotel keeper receives $1 for each loaf of bread, or $587 for the bread made from the barrel of flour for which the farmer received $7. The consumers pay not only $587 for the bread which was formerly served free of charge but also pay from two to five times the price previously paid for the steak. At the restaurant in the Union Station, now operated by the Government, two shredded wheat biscuits and cream cost 40 cents; of that amount the farmer who produced the wheat and milk received about 1 cent. The waiter receives about 15 cents in addition to his regular wages. The producer receives 1 cent, the waiter receives in addition to his regular wages fifteen times as much as the producer, and the consumer pays fifty-five times the amount received by the farmer.

Send your shoes out and have them half-soled and you pay $2.50. The farmer who raised the steer and sold the hide receives less than 10 cents, hence a spread of $2.40, or 2,400 per cent.

Rents, transportation, and numerous other items for which the farmer receives nothing enter into the cost of living. Yet some people hold the farmer responsible for the present high cost of living. The increases referred to may or may not be due to profiteering.

One suggests prohibiting the exportation of wheat. The President states in his message that "the price of wheat is lower in the United States than in Europe, and can, with proper management, be kept so." If so, and if wages are not reduced, and if no effort has been made to reduce the alleged profiteering and the astounding profits referred to in the Federal Trade Commission's report, but little relief can be looked for as to bread. Cut the price paid to the farmer in two and the reduction in the cost of living would be practically nothing as compared with the wide spread between the farmer and the consumer. If the price of farm products is reduced below the cost of production, the farmer naturally ceases to produce. There is no law to compel him to produce at a loss. If so, we will be confronted with a scarcity, and if the law of supply and demand regulates, instead of prices coming down they will go up. If so, in order to accomplish results desired, profits and wages will have to be reduced.

The Department of Justice has power to regulate profits. As to wages, many suggestions have been made. One suggestion to increase the yield of the farms at a lower cost is to import help who will work at a moderate wage. The importation of Chinese and Japanese under contract has often been suggested. The contention is that they would work for a lower wage than the average hired man, but that does not seem practicable, certainly not at a time when many of our own people are out of work, and it, of course, would result in reducing the wage of the American laborer. Being a firm believer in a protective tariff, I can see no justice in depriving the wage earner of protection and giving protection to the manufacturer or producer. Our policy has been to restrict immigration rather than to encourage it. If it is the desire to reduce wages, that, of course, can be accomplished by carrying out the suggestion prohibiting exports of foodstuffs. Prohibiting exports would, of course, decrease the demand. If it reduced the price of products, it naturally would stifle production on the farm. Our experience has been that when we have business lagging on the farm we have crumbling banks and closed factories and mills in the cities. When we have closed factories the wage earner is, of course, out of employment. The result would be the same as a number of years ago when farm products were selling low; when wheat and corn were selling for less than one-tenth of what they are now selling. There was no scarcity of food then, but exceeding shortage of money with which to buy food; no complaint of high prices then, nevertheless many went hungry. Hence there is no relief in that. Instead of relief, it would result not only in starvation in Europe but hardship in this country as well. If exports of all foodstuffs were prohibited we would be cut off from $2,504,895,554 annually paid us for foodstuffs. Balances of trade are settled in gold. As exports are cut down, balances in our favor are cut correspondingly.

Whenever imports exceed our exports we have an adverse balance, which means the exportation of gold. Gold is the basis of currency. When gold is exported and if our supply should be exhausted we would be forced to go into the world's market to buy gold. The more gold we will have to buy the more bonds and certificates of indebtedness or currency we will have to issue. The further we travel in that direction the deeper we get into the hole. The American dollar has already depreciated 50 cents. The processes of depreciation have, I take it, been satisfactorily demonstrated in our recent experience. The Bureau of Engraving and Printing was enlarged. It has been running night and day to its fullest capacity printing bonds, certificates of indebtedness, war savings and thrift stamps of all denominations. According to the Treasury report we have in circulation upward of $3,000,000,000 in Federal reserve notes. According to the Treasury report our stock of money in circulation has increased from $3,477,368,000, or $35.12 per capita, in 1914, to $5,841,027,000, or $54.28 per capita July 1 1919. Our stock of money in the United States has increased from $3,775,464,000 to $7,588,474,000.

Paper currency in circulation in the United Kingdom has increased from $144,000,000 in 1913 to $2,058,000,000 in 1919, or from $3.18 to $45.50 per capita; in France, from $1,103,000,000 in 1913 to $6,757,000,000 in 1919, or from $27.85 to $170.62 per capita; in Germany from $617,000,000 to $9,815,000,000 in 1919, or from $9.50 to $151.17 per capita; in Italy from $441,000,000 in 1913 to $2,241,000,000 in 1918, or from $1.72 to $64.62 per capita.

It is generally considered that inflation in currency is due to the depreciation that has taken place. The American dollar has shrunk in two. According to recent quotations, rates of foreign exchange on France have depreciated about 33 per cent; Germany, 75 per cent; England, 12 per cent. So if the value of the American dollar has depreciated 50 cents and if German paper currency is worth only 25 per cent of the American dollar, it has depreciated to 12½ cents. If French currency is worth only two-thirds of the American dollar, its present value is only about 34 cents. The difference is accounted for in the fact that the United States has increased its currency only from $35.12 to $54.28 per capita. It has a supply of gold and has maintained its credit better than others. France increased the paper currency circulation from $27.85 to $170.62; Germany, from $9.50 to $151.17 per capita. They are practically without gold reserve, and evidently their credit is more materially impaired. With the 15 principal countries of the world increasing the quantity of paper money from $8,000,000,000 to $30,000,000,000 in 51 months, with the Governments of the world paying $10,000,000,000 interest on national debts, as compared with $2,000,000,000 at the beginning of the war, with $180,000,000,000 issued in bonds and other forms of national obligations by the Governments of the world in the past four years, it is not difficult to understand the present value of a dollar.

Another suggestion made is to dispose of the stock of foods held in cold storage. According to the report of the Bureau of Markets, and Mr. Weld, of Swift & Co., the stock held in cold storage July 1, 1919, was:

Bureau of Markets reports on hand July 1, 1919.

	Amount.	Percentage of total production.	Would last—
			Days.
Eggs.....cases..	7,508,530	7	22
Butter.....pounds..	87,851,371	6	20
Poultry.....do....	48,895,000	3	10
Frozen beef.....do....	162,386,570	2	7
Pork products, including lard.....do....	1,047,808,000	10	35

About two-thirds of this quantity is in process of being cured in pickle and salt and is not ready for market.

By it it will be seen the amount on hand is only from 2 to 10 per cent of the total annual production of the various commodities, which, according to the report, would last only from 7 to 35 days, and that two-thirds of pork products is in process of being cured and not ready for the market. If disposed of and consumed now in a period of plenty or surplus, there would be a shortage later in the period of scarcity. The object of cold storage is to conserve foodstuffs, to carry them over from the period of plenty to the period of scarcity. The question is, then, "Shall we consume the surplus now and go hungry later?" Obviously it would be folly to do so.

It seems, then, that the principal causes for the present high cost of living are profiteering, scarcity, high wages, and inflation of currency. If a reduction in the high cost of living is to be brought about, all of the four causes must be readjusted. Profiteering can and should be speedily controlled and discontinued. The President has the information and power to do it. Scarcity can be prevented by encouragement and just treatment to the producer. The readjustment of wages is a matter for the wage earner to determine. As long as wages continue to increase, so long will the cost of living continue to increase. When wages are lowered, the cost of living will decrease correspondingly. The deflation of currency will require time. Obligations have been assumed. They must be met and redeemed. The world is on a credit basis, not on a cash basis. Hence, like a merchant or farmer without cash to redeem his obligations, who must renew or borrow from another. So with Uncle Sam. If he has not the cash, he must do as he is now doing, renew or borrow and issue evidence of indebtedness. If deflation of our currency is to be accomplished, if the obligations are to be redeemed, expenditures must be kept below the income. Now is the time to make use of the pruning knife. The question, then, is, Shall profiteering, scarcity, inflation, and high wages continue? Shall we continue extravagance? Shall we continue to appropriate and expend money beyond our income and to do business on a 50-cent dollar? Or shall we encourage production, practice economy, pay our debts, and return to the good old 100-cent dollar and normal conditions?

How much time have I left, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield those two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I want to digress for a minute from the talk feast and say a word relative to the high cost of living. I just want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the hungry people of the cities should have something to say about this bill. When the hungry people of the cities learn what you are trying to put over on them, giving the country a bill of this kind and saying that you are going to stop hoarding, and you specifically exempt the farmer against that, it is nothing but a camouflage and a bluff. [Applause.] We passed a food-control bill in 1917. Let me say to the Democratic side of the House that you have had a food-control bill on the statute books since we declared war, and under that bill you had the power to take an inventory of all the food of this country, and you should know exactly how much we have in storage—how much meat we have, how much corn we have. That was the purpose of the law. You have authority to confiscate hoarded supplies and dispose of them. You seem now not to know what we have. You admit the power but confess to your failure to perform, and therefore you have been derelict in your duty.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have only a minute; I refuse to yield. Bolsheviks are made by appeals through empty stomachs and not through empty heads. The stomachs of the farmers of this country are full, and the stomachs of the residents of the cities are empty. Now, the distinguished leader of the Democratic Party said that this is the President's bill, and that the Republican Party has followed his instructions. If that is all, if he asked them, then we look toward the Democratic administration and the Department of Justice, which is in your hands, and the Department of Agriculture, which is in your hands, and you have got to make good or we will call your bluff.

Mr. FERRIS. Congress is in your hands, too.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Department of Justice is in yours, and you have slept on the job. If there is any food hoarded, it is because you did not exercise the power the law gave you.

Somebody remarked the only profiteers were the Republicans, which proves that you shut your eyes to protect your own profiteers. I will tell you that any man who profiteered during this war is not a Republican or a Democrat. He has no country; he has no flag. His flag is the multicolored petticoat of the demimonde and his god is his dollar. He will soon be marked, and the scorn of his neighbors will drive him to other lands. Now, if your Department of Justice means business, let them get after these hoarders. Let us see if you mean what you say. I predict that you will fail in this as you have failed in the execution of the original law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE] is in control of the time.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the bill be read for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It will.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, this bill we are considering is offered as an amendment to the "food-control" act. That act expires, by its terms, as contained in section 24, "when the existing state of war between the United States and Germany shall have terminated, and the fact and date of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President." The pending bill does not change that provision of the food-control act. Therefore what we may do here will affect the cost of living only up to the time when the end of the war may be proclaimed by the President. If the treaty of peace should be ratified to-morrow, this law would be no longer in force, and then absolutely nothing would stand between the profiteers and the people of America.

I had hoped that the Committee on Agriculture might bring forward some bill that would adequately meet the situation. I had hoped that they would bring forward something that would extend for a reasonable time after the war, so as to protect the people and give some real relief against the high cost of living. That able committee has been holding hearings. We have read about them in the newspapers. They have brought forth their bill, and I find, to my utter amazement, that there is no attempt to deal with this question in any permanent or effectual way, but merely to extend the provisions of a law which may expire within the next few weeks. The President is urging upon the Senate that action upon the treaty of peace shall be speedily taken.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will.

Mr. HAUGEN. I think the gentleman will agree with me that there is no haste as to a permanent law, but that this is temporary in its nature and ought to be taken care of. We have devoted a great deal of our time to cold storage and other propositions, and there were a number of suggestions made.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The prime and important question before the people to-day is the cost of living.

Mr. HAUGEN. And cold storage is one of the questions.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. That is merely a detail of the great question. Any measure that assumes to meet this situation and assumes to meet it only pending the ratification of the treaty of peace is wholly inadequate and will not answer the purpose. I will not use the word "camouflage," but some expression akin to that would well fit this bill. Profiteering will not cease with the ratification of the treaty; it will go on as long as conditions will permit it. We must legislate so as to deal with the situation.

We have had a great deal said in the papers, we have had moaning and groaning on the part of this great committee, and now we find that they have brought forth with much acclaim the veritable mouse we read about in the fable.

Now, it may be that some gentlemen think that Congress has not the constitutional power to deal with this situation. I had that idea myself at one time in the past. Perhaps if I had the rewriting of the Constitution I would fix it so that Congress would not have the power, but I can not do that. The Constitution is here. As construed by the Supreme Court it gives Congress the power to pass a law that will have effect long enough after the coming of peace to cure this system of profiteering, to remedy the high cost of living. There are several decisions of the court to that effect.

I imagine there are a good many gentlemen in the House who hold to the opinion I held until I had investigated the subject. I want to refer those gentlemen to several cases decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. Perhaps the leading case is the case of Steward v. Kahn (11 Wallace, 493), where the court undertook to construe a "stay" law passed by Congress during the Civil War. It was passed as a war measure and in exercise of the war powers of Congress. By its terms the law had operation for a period after the war—after the war period had passed. The court said, on page 506 of the report:

> The Constitution gives to Congress the power to declare war, to raise and support armies and navies. Congress is authorized to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect granted powers. The measures to be taken in carrying on war and to suppress insurrection are not defined. The decision rests fully in the discretion of those to whom the powers involved are confided by the Constitution. In the latter case the power is not limited to victory in the field and the dispersion of the insurgent forces. It carries with it the power to guard against the immediate renewal of the conflict and to remedy the evils which have arisen during its rise and progress. This act falls within the latter category. The power to pass it is really implied from its power to make war and suppress insurrection. It is a beneficent exercise of this authority.

The case of The United States v. Gettysburg Electric Railway Co. (160 U. S., 668) decided that the act of Congress approved March 3, 1893, creating the military park at Gettysburg, and the act approved June 4, 1894, granting the power of condemnation for the purposes of such park, were valid under the war power of Congress. These acts were passed 28 years after the close of the Civil War.

Justice Peckham, for a unanimous court, stated, at page 681:

> Upon the question whether the proposed use of this land is a public one, we think there can be no well-founded doubt; also in our judgment the Government has the constitutional power to condemn land for the proposed use. * * * Congress has power to declare war and to create and equip armies and navies. It has the great power of taxation to be exercised for the common defense and general welfare. Having such powers, it has such other and implied ones as are necessary and appropriate for the purpose of carrying the powers expressly given into effect. Any act of Congress which directly tends to enhance the respect and love of a citizen for the institutions of his country and to quicken and strengthen his motives to defend them, and which is germane to and intimately connected with and appropriate to the exercise of some one or all of the powers granted by Congress, must be valid. This proposed use comes within such description. The provision comes within the rule laid down by Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat., 316), in these words: "Let the end be legitimate and within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adequate to that end, which are not prohibited or inconsistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional."

The second Legal Tender case of Knox v. Lee (12 Wall., 540) held that the war power of Congress warranted its legal-tender statutes, which were valid not only as to transactions before but after its enactment and after the conclusion of the war.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, how much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. Nine minutes remain.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield nine minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized for nine minutes.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we are confronted to-day with the most remarkable situation I have ever seen in the consideration of a bill reported from the Committee on Agriculture. This is the first time in my eight years of service that I have seen a measure from our committee, affecting as this one does the people of the entire country, made the basis of a political discussion. More than a hundred million people are anxiously looking to the Congress to enact some sort of legislation which will in some degree at least reduce the high cost of living. So great was the demand that Congress should legislate upon this question that the President of the United States caused the Senate and the House to convene in joint session, came before them, and delivered his special message upon the subject, suggesting ways and means whereby it might be met. The Committee on Agriculture held extensive hearings, and after mature deliberation reported to the House the pending measure.

The membership of this House is entitled to a full and free discussion of this bill; they are anxious to know just what its provisions are and how it will affect the high cost of living. I say to you frankly, gentlemen on both sides, I doubt if there are a dozen of you, outside of the Members on the Committee on Agriculture, who know a single, solitary thing about this bill. This is not strange; the bill was only reported yesterday afternoon. It is brought up for consideration under a rule with a limited debate of two hours, one hour on a side. Now, what happens? Under the usual and customary proceedings the chairman of the committee would take the floor, open the discussion, and explain in detail the provisions of the measure. Did that happen? No. The members of the Committee on Agriculture, the majority members, who are supposed to take the lead in the debate, sat quietly in their seats. The chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], able gentleman though he is, did not open the debate. He did not take the floor and attempt to tell you gentlemen what was in the bill. He could have done so; yet when he brings in here a measure of profound interest to all the people what does he do? He calls out upon the floor a gentleman who is always ready and willing, a gentleman upon whom that side can always rely when you are to have a political field day. He brings out the able and distinguished political orator from the State of Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] to open the debate by making a political speech and abusing the Attorney General, our great President, and everybody and everything connected with the administration. He did not discuss the bill; he did not want to discuss it. Not being a member of our committee, I doubt if he knew what it contained. The gentleman from Illinois was followed by other distinguished gentlemen on that side, none of whom were members of the committee, and who followed the lead of their colleague [Mr. RODENBERG]. Practically the whole time on that side has been taken up in faultfinding and in criticism of the administration. This is no time to play politics; this is no time for vituperation and abuse. This is a time for sane, deliberative action which will bring relief to millions upon millions suffering untold hardships and deprivations because of the greed and avarice of profiteers, who, taking advantage of war conditions, are seeking to enrich themselves by charging extortionate prices for the necessaries of human life.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a question?

Mr. RUBEY. No; I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RUBEY. Now, then, what is in this bill?

Mr. LAYTON. That is what I intended to ask the gentleman.

Mr. RUBEY. And that is what your chairman of the Committee on Agriculture should have told you the very first thing when this bill was brought before the House.

Mr. LAYTON. Will you not tell me for my information?

Mr. RUBEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAYTON. I simply wanted to say that there are some Members of the House who would like to have this bill discussed, and if the gentleman does understand the bill I would like to hear him, and I promise I will stay here and hear him.

Mr. RUBEY. Well, I will discuss the bill. I have been calling the attention of the House and the country to the policy pursued in this discussion by Members on that side of the House, but since the gentleman is so kind as to ask me what is in this bill I shall not pursue that line of thought further. I will tell you what is in this bill. This bill provides for two amendments to the food-control act. If you will read the first paragraph of that act you will find that certain things are therein enumerated and designated as necessaries, such as foods, feeds, fertilizers, fuel, tools, implements, machinery, and so forth. This bill inserts the words "wearing apparel and containers."

Now, in addition to giving the Government control over all these necessaries, including wearing apparel, we add a penalty clause on section 4 of the food-control act. Section 4 of that act as it was passed by the last Congress did not contain a penalty clause.

Section 4 of the food-control act is as follows:

SEC. 4. That it is hereby made unlawful for any person willfully to destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof; knowingly to commit waste or willfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in or in connection with their production, manufacture, or distribution; to hoard, as defined in section 6 of this act, any necessaries; to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any necessaries; to engage in any discriminatory and unfair or any deceptive or wasteful practice or device, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge, in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries; to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person, (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict distribution of any necessaries; (d) to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof; or (e) to exact excessive prices for any necessaries, or to aid or abet the doing of any act made unlawful by this section.

To that section we have added the penalty clause as follows:

Any person violating any of the provisions of this section upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, horticulturist, vineyardist, planter, ranchman, dairyman, stockman, or other agriculturist, with respect to the farm products produced or raised upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by him: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to forbid or make unlawful collective bargaining by any cooperative association or other association of farmers, dairymen, gardeners, or other producers of farm products with respect to the farm products produced or raised by its members upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by them.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUBEY. I yield.

Mr. LAYTON. What I am chiefly interested in is this: My judgment is that the cost of living in this country to-day is not due to any excessive profits by the farmer, not due to any greatly excessive profits on the part of the packers——

Mr RUBEY. Do not take up too much of my time.

Mr. LAYTON. I will get at it.

Mr. RUBEY. Very well.

Mr. LAYTON. But it is due to the middleman; and the proposition that was advanced by the gentleman from Texas, I think—I am not familiar with all these gentlemen yet—in which the profiteer is found in the small dealer in the town and the village and the city, is perhaps correct.

Mr. RUBEY. I can not yield further.

Mr. LAYTON. I want to ask you whether this bill, in your judgment, will reach him?

Mr. RUBEY. I think it will. I will say this to the gentleman, that this bill is intended to reach primarily the profiteer, wherever he may be found.

Mr. LAYTON. Then it is a good bill.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a pertinent question?

Mr. RUBEY. I regret I can not yield to the gentleman. I want to say of this bill that in my opinion it may not do a great deal of good in itself, but I am satisfied that the effect of this measure and the effect of the prosecutions that will come under it, when the authority is given, will be most wholesome and salutary throughout the country.

Mr. LAYTON. A moral effect?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes; a moral effect, as suggested by the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. Chairman, I want very briefly to discuss the exemptions in the penalty clause, those provisions to which some of our city members have objected, claiming that it is class legislation in the interest of the farmer. It is not special legislation in the interest of the farmer, but if it were I would still be for it. If there is any class of people in our country that needs the encouragement and help of the Government it is the farmer. To him the entire Nation looks for its food supply. The farmer is not going to violate the provisions of section 4. He could not violate many of them if he wanted to. He toils early and late through all kinds of weather to produce his crop, and certainly after it is produced he is not going out willfully to waste or destroy it. He has a perfect right to hold the products of his labor until he gets ready to market them without being accused of hoarding, and certainly no one is going to accuse him of exacting excessive prices for his products.

The farmer has about as much to say about the price he shall receive for what he raises as the fabled man in the moon. He goes to market with his cattle and his hogs, his grain and his hay, his poultry, butter, and eggs, and in each and every case the purchaser fixes the price he shall receive. The farmer can not, in any sense of the word, become a profiteer. He can not fix the price at which this product may sell. Individually in this regard he is utterly helpless. The only possible way that the farmer can help himself and have something to say about the price of his own product is by cooperative organization.

Cooperative bargaining is the only method I know of that will bring relief to the farmer and keep him from being at the mercy of dealers in farm products. I hope the day will not be far distant when the farmers of this country may become thoroughly organized. Every other industry is organized; why not the farmer? Cooperative bargaining on the part of the farmers will give them a chance to have some little to say about what they shall receive for the fruits of their honest toil. We specifically exempt the individual farmer so that he may not be unnecessarily persecuted and annoyed, and we give him the right to unite with his neighbors in the sale of his products because it is right and proper that he should have that privilege. By placing these exemptions in the law we send a message of cheer to the American farmer, we encourage him to produce, we say to him, "The Congress of the United States is with you, not against you; continue to produce the food so necessary to the welfare of the Nation and you shall be protected in your rights."

Mr. Chairman, the high cost of living can not be charged against the farmer; the exorbitant prices paid by consumers are placed upon the products after they leave the farmer and go into the channels of trade. The high cost of living is not confined to food alone; it applies with equal force to clothing, shoes, furniture, lumber, farm machinery; in brief, to all those things which are absolutely essential to the happiness and comfort of our people. It has come upon us by reason of the war and conditions growing out of that awful conflict. It can not be cured in a day. It can not be cured by legislation.

After all is said and done, it will be the American people themselves who will finally put an end to the reign of extortion and greed now pervading the country. The people can be depended upon to cooperate with the authorities, both State and National, in the enforcement of this and other laws. The people will very soon make it not only dangerous but unpopular and finally unprofitable for men to deal unfairly with their fellow man. If we would return to normal conditions, it behooves us one and all during these days of reconstruction to stand up for the right, denounce the wrong, practice economy, frown down extravagance, encourage correct living, and work together for the good of all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, there has been no presentation of any arguments here in opposition to this measure, which has a unanimous report, and I therefore ask unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes in opposition to this bill.

Mr. HAUGEN. I suggest that the first section of the bill be read before the gentleman does that.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The time was fixed by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate was limited to two hours.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MACCRATE. Did the rule provide for two hours' debate in favor of the bill or one hour in favor and one hour to those opposed to it?

The CHAIRMAN. It provided for two hours' debate, one half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and the other half by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE]. The two hours have expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That by reason of the existence of a state of war it is essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, wearing apparel, containers primarily designed or intended for containing foods, feeds, or fertilizers, fuel, including fuel oil and natural gas, and fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients, tools, utensils, implements, machinery, and equipment required for the actual production of foods, feeds, and fuel, hereafter in this act called necessaries, to prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, manipulation, and private controls affecting such supply, distribution, and movement, and to establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war. For such purposes the instrumentalities, means, methods, powers, authorities, duties, obligations, and prohibitions hereinafter set forth are created, established, conferred, and prescribed. The President is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as are essential effectively to carry out the provisions of this act."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Did he ask for recognition?

The CHAIRMAN. He was on his feet.

Mr. HAUGEN. I suggest that we limit the time for debate on this section to 20 minutes. I ask unanimous consent to limit the debate on this section to 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that debate on this section be limited to 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Several Members objected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I shall take up only a moment, although I have five minutes. I merely want to answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON].

Mr. TREADWAY. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman is not discussing his motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. The last word is "act."

Mr. TREADWAY. I insist that the gentleman confine himself to his motion.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, under this act which we are now discussing the contention of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] is met.

Mr. TREADWAY. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman is not discussing his motion to strike out the last word. I insist that he confine himself to his motion.

Mr. BLANTON. I am confining myself to the motion.

Mr. TREADWAY. I ask for a ruling by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to his motion.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, under this act——

Mr. LAYTON. Does the Chair mean to say that the gentleman from Texas is confined to a definition of the word "act"?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine his discussion to the motion.

Mr. BLANTON. Under this act the retail merchant doing business of $100,000 or less per year, who was exempted under the former law, is brought before the bar of the country.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is not discussing his motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am. The last word "act" covers the whole bill, and I am discussing the bill. It does reach the profiteer who by reason of doing a business of $100,000 or less has been making, if he sold the cabbages mentioned in Oklahoma, $86,000 profit in a year while doing only $100,000 worth of business.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is not discussing his motion to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to the discussion of his motion if the point of order is insisted upon.

Mr. TREADWAY. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am discussing the last word, which is "act."

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman's motion was to strike out the last word. The gentleman is not discussing that motion.

Mr. BLANTON. I am confining myself to the last word, which is "act," and which word "act" covers this entire bill, and no reasonable expounder of the English language can justly contend otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to his motion.

Mr. BLANTON. I am doing so, Mr. Chairman, although the contentiously technical gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] could not have revised and extended his remarks yesterday if I had not kindly permitted him to do so, for he did so after asking for and obtaining my consent, which I gave even after he had refused to yield to me very abruptly.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman from Massachusetts is quite able to take care of himself.

Mr. BLANTON. I am quite sure you are, even though you are certainly not very civil and grateful at times.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think all my time should be taken up by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will proceed in order.

Mr. FERRIS. My point of order is that one Member sitting in his seat and one standing on the floor should not address each other in the second person.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's point of order is very well taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, after taking out the time occupied by the gentleman from Massachusetts, will the Chair advise me how much time I have left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes left.

Mr. BLANTON. And in that two minutes again I want the gentleman to know that under this "act"——

Mr. TREADWAY. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman is not confining himself to his motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman's motion is to strike out the last word. I insist that he confine himself to that motion.

Mr. BLANTON. Gentlemen, under the precedent established yesterday I made a motion to strike out the word "act" when I do not intend to strike it out. The gentleman from Massachusetts yesterday made a motion against which he and his whole Republican side voted strongly and unanimously. I am following the Republican precedent set yesterday by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I made a motion to strike out the word "act" when I want it left in; and I want it left in because it reaches the retailers of Massachusetts who, like the cabbage sellers of Oklahoma, have been making $86,000 a year profit on $100,000 worth of business. That is the only point I make.

Mr. TREADWAY. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman is not confining himself to the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. QUIN and Mr. MACCRATE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MACCRATE. Did I understand the Chair to say he would recognize me after the gentleman from Texas had concluded?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] is recognized.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I think this House is proceeding in a very orderly manner on a very grave subject. In my judgment the real causes of the high cost of living have not been touched on in this debate at all, and this bill that we have before us, while I am going to vote for it with all of my heart, is not going to materially change the situation, because the high cost of living comes from fundamental causes. This profiteering is just a kind of surface matter. It does not reach the point. Here is this whole world practically without food. All of Europe is calling on the United States of America for food and clothing, and with the inflation of our money to-day, with two and a half billion dollars in reserve-bank notes and $34,000,000,000 in United States bonds and other evidences of debt, with the currency of the country inflated and the purchasing power of the dollar decreased, with the salaries of all people—Government employees, railroad employees, everyone engaged in activities—raised sky-high, and freight rates on railroads raised very high to in a measure pay increased expenses, after the world has been engaged for four or five years in destruction not only of human life but of human property, with the cessation of productive activities naturally there is a shortage of foodstuffs and wearing apparel and machinery of all kinds, and of all kinds of raw materials throughout the United States and Europe; and as long as we keep our goods going abroad as they are going to-day and have been going for three years we are going to have the high cost of living in this country, regardless of any legislation that this Congress can pass. We can not stop the law of supply and demand. The only way that we can reduce the price of foodstuffs and wearing apparel is to put an embargo on goods going abroad and keep them in this country. I would not approve of that, because it would bring destruction to Europe and serious disaster to all our own factories and farms.

Some men talk about sending the farmer to the penitentiary for profiteering. The farmer is no profiteer and never has been. I was surprised when the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] said that the Attorney General of the United States suggested that the farmer should be fined $5,000 and put in jail, and so on.

Mr. RUBEY rose.

Mr. QUIN. I have not time to yield; but I just want to say that they all forget about the farmer. These people who live in the glare of the electric lights forget all about the farmer, and you can not throw a lasso and drag them out there to the farms.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. No, thank you—excuse me. Old bossy is calling on these electric-light people to come out and feed her and milk her and to make butter, and the hogs are squealing for these people to come out and give them some corn, and the people of the cities are crying for bread, and they can not get it unless people go on the farm and produce it, and yet some people think that the farmer is a profiteer. They will not go out and work on the farm in the sun and rain, but they want to sit under the shade all day, and then claim great big salaries for whatever work they do and expect the farmer to sell the product of his labor for nothing. The farmer is not getting too much for what he is raising. I want to tell you that I went through the hardships of a poor farm boy myself. The farmer is the only man that never has been getting what he deserves. While this war was on and now he is really getting a decent price for what he produces. It is not easy for Government officials to fool the American people on this subject. No kind of legislation that this Congress can pass can artificially reduce the cost of living. The only thing Congress can do, outside of preventing profiteering along certain lines, is to deflate the currency and to place an embargo on our American products being shipped abroad. We can not afford to deflate the currency, because this would bring about the greatest crisis and panic this country ever experienced. Neither can we afford to place an embargo on the products of our farms or of our factories and mines.

Practically all of Europe—the chief market of America—would be ruined and starvation would face her people. Commercially it would be a colossal blunder. As a great Nation we would be held up to ridicule and scorn. Our people must be told the truth.

The cost of living is bound to remain high till the farms and factories of Europe produce what they need; and, further, till normal conditions are established on the farm and in the factory production in our own country; and, still further, till after the currency of this country shall have been deflated through a gradual process unannounced to the public.

Gentlemen, these matters I have stated are fundamental. The real remedy lies in the hope that our people will stop talking about the high cost of living and thinking that Congress can lower the price of everything. There is too much extravagance all over the country. The people must practice economy and save both food and money. If necessary, we must tighten up the belt a notch or two. More people must go to working the lands of this country and produce more to eat. The shortage is world-wide, and this condition will last for a long time after the treaty of peace is signed.

The law of supply and demand is bound to control prices, and all values will be high until the production harmonizes with consumption. To-day consumption is greater than production. If I have stated a fact, can any act of Congress or any State legislature lower the prices of commodities, except the element of profiteering, which in reality is only negligible in the equation of high prices for life's necessities? Do you think there is anybody fool enough to believe this Government, that spent $47,000,000,000 within two years and raised everybody's salary and borrowed more money than there is in all the world, can, by a fiat of Congress, reduce the prices of the products of the farm and the factory of this land? It can not be done except in the regular, natural, normal way. We can in a measure stop some of the profiteering. Let us do that right now. Tell the people all soldiers must get back into active pursuits and that production must be increased and consumption decreased before there can be any real and permanent decrease in the cost of living. [Applause.]

Mr. MacCRATE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

As a man who comes from a large city, I realize, as does every city man who thinks, that we depend ultimately upon the man with the hoe for our food and provisions. [Applause.] We know that if the farmer ceases to sow the seed and till the soil, if he will not watch and care for his crops, if he refuses to nurture his sheep and cattle, the great cities of the country will crumble. Wall Street and Broadway, our bright highways, our museums, our libraries, indeed, all that we believe makes cities great, would profit us nothing if the farmer stops producing.

But I say emphatically that honesty is known among the dwellers of the city as well as among the farmers of the country. Men of the city no less than men of the country prize a good name, love childhood, honor womanhood, and for right and for country stand ready to yield the full measure of devotion. Virtue finds a happy habitation in the motherhood of America, whether watching little feet play among the roses or stumble up the stairs of darkened tenements. Virtue cares not where men and women live. Neither does vice. In God's great sunlight, where birds sing and flowers bloom and the air is free from taint, as well as in the markets and amid the humming machinery of the metropolis, there are men whose hearts are the dwelling place of corruption and greed. It was in the garden called Eden that evil first came among men.

Therefore I must protest when you will declare by law that hoarders and profiteers and food destroyers are found only in the towns and cities. No honest farmer desires that we shall pass class legislation here. He knows that among the men about him are some moved by the greed of gain like that which moves the city food hoarder and profiteer.

Can right in the country be wrong in the city? Will you say that the place of abode shall determine whether a man is a food hoarder or a price fixer? We Members from the city have, and now are willing to vote, millions to help the farmer get old earth to increase her yield, for we have watched with concern our numbers grow larger from decade to decade, until to-day we who consume are more than you who produce the food of the Nation. Our very growth has made your labor greater. But will you now, against the dictates of American honor and justice, say that hoarders and profiteers and food destroyers are such only when they do not till the soil? You attempt more than the divine law has done. You do more than the founders of this Nation thought would be done. This Government extends equal protection of its laws to the humblest as well as to the mightiest; it guarantees life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to all, regardless of race, religion, or color. Will you ask that its condemnation of criminal conduct be less broad? You may; but I believe the honorable body of Americans for whom you seek to speak do not desire you to do so.

We have been asked to legislate to reduce the cost of living. We have been told existing law is insufficient. We are asked to vote the people's money in large sums. For two years we have had law and we have voted much money. What has that law and what has the expenditure of that money accomplished? Congress should be informed, for we must weigh well our acts. On this subject the Nation demands our wisest counsel.

I have therefore submitted a resolution calling on the Attorney General to state to Congress what he has done under existing food laws and how much help he has received from other executive departments in discovering violations of the laws from January 1, 1919, to June 30, 1919. The time has come when Congress must refuse to submit to graceful battering in its own meeting place to cover laxity and inefficiency of members of the Cabinet.

Congress, by the food-survey act passed in August, 1917, granted power to the Secretary of Agriculture to go into every packing house, cold-storage plant, food-hoarding spot, and retail store in America and demand to be informed as to the cost, production, and prices of foodstuffs. What has Mr. Houston, the Secretary of Agriculture, done with those powers? Congress voted $2,225,000 in November, 1918, to the Secretary of Agriculture to get and give to the people the facts about the production, storing, cost, and hoarding of food, and to that sum added $7,000,000 to stimulate meat and food production. In July, 1919, it gave him $1,157,970 to lay food facts before the people. He now asks for $500,000 additional. Congress demands to know what he has done with the powers and millions already voted before it blindly grants additional moneys and continues in peace times war measures. Has the Secretary of Agriculture, with the $3,250,000 which he had, in one year discovered food curbers, profiteers, and price fixers? Has he recommended prosecution of them by the Attorney General? How many have been convicted through the activity of Mr. Palmer, the Attorney General? If they have not been prosecuted the country demands the reason why.

The President chided Congress for not granting all moneys requested by the executive departments, and he asked that the hoarding of foodstuffs and fuel be made unlawful, yet for two years by the very first section of the Food Control Act, those subjects are stated to be necessaries and by section 6 a jail penalty is established for hoarding them, and by section 7 they may be sold by the courts. Since January of this year surely the food question has been sufficiently acute to have demanded action under the law as it is.

What prosecutions have been instituted by the Attorney General to get food hoarders, and how much of their hoarding has he sold to the public? The President also asked that a penalty for profiteering should be added to the law, yet the Attorney General suggests only one penalty amendment, which tends to cut in half the penalty already in the law against enhancing the price of foodstuffs. How many prosecutions have been instituted for willful destruction of foodstuffs by the Attorney General? By section 9 of the same food law passed in 1917 persons combining or agreeing to enhance the price of food may be sent to jail for two years. Are there in jail to-day any convicted under that section through the activity of the Attorney General?

Never in the history of the country has the executive branch of the Government received greater power or more money from Congress to hunt and punish food profiteers than it has to-day. Congress has gone the limit in giving the executive departments inquisitorial powers into the details of private business. The President, under section 13 of the food law, for two years past, and to-day, has power to close every stock exchange in America if prices are manipulated, and four years in jail faces any person who violates the rules regulating stock exchanges laid down by him. The powers conferred are so great that the Attorney General and Secretary of Agriculture have submitted but a single amendment.

If with these powers and penalties under existing law the prices of life's necessaries have continued to increase, it is time to find whether failure to enforce the law is the cause or whether in spite of the strictest enforcement prices refuse to halt. If the Attorney General has prosecuted to the limit all violations reported and the Secretary of Agriculture has exercised all powers conferred upon him, let us look for remedies in other directions. With $2,000,000 last year and $1,600,000 voted in July of this year to the Attorney General, Congress has a right to demand of him an account of his activities before it votes the $2,000,000 additional which he now seeks.

All executive departments are publishing promises of a nation-wide hunt for hoarders and profiteers. The people are sick of publicity and promises. They want prosecutions pushed, if justified, and they want them dropped if they are unjustified. They demand to know what has been done before they will believe promises of performance. Let the Secretary of Agriculture and Attorney General show that conscienceless crooks have found their way to jail and that food prices have fallen under the laws on the books for two years, then the country will willingly give them additional millions. Prison and not publicity is the cure for profiteering. The place to attack price-fixers and food hoarders is not the rostrum of the House of Representatives but in the courts of the country before American juries. The thick hide of food manipulators can not be pierced by polished shafts of rhetoric hurled from high places. Prison fare is the only food that will nourish their almost dead sense of concern for their fellow men.

I ask you to consider the resolution which I have introduced, and which I add as a part of my remarks, as but an honest attempt to get information which will aid us to determine how effective is legislation in affecting the cost of living:

House resolution 248.

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he hereby is, directed to furnish forthwith to the House of Representatives the number of violations of section 2 of the food-control act, approved August 10, 1917, covering cost, prices, and supply of food reported to the Department of Justice by the Secretary of Agriculture from January 1, 1919, to June 30, 1919, the number of prosecutions instituted therefor, and the convictions obtained, with the names of the convicted.

Also the total number of violations of sections 4 and 6 of the food-control act, approved August 10, 1917, covering the willful destruction, hoarding, limitation of production, and unfair price-fixing of necessaries reported to the Department of Justice from January 1, 1919, to June 30, 1919; the number of violations of such sections reported by the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Labor, the Department of Commerce, and the Department of the Treasury, respectively; the prosecutions instituted therefor, and the number of convictions obtained, with the names of the convicted.

Also all violations of section 13 of the food-control act authorizing the President to prevent undue enhancement of prices and other evil practices reported to the Department of Justice from January 1, 1919, to June 30, 1919, and all prosecutions instituted therefor and all convictions obtained, with the names of the convicted.

Also the total amount of hoarded necessaries sold by the courts after proceedings instituted by the Department of Justice, in pursuance of section 7 of the food-control act.

Also the number of proceedings instituted by the Department of Justice, in accordance with the recommendation of the Federal Trade Commission in its report of May, 1918; the indictments found in such proceedings, the dates of such indictments, and the defendants named therein; and the convictions obtained thereon and the names of the defendants.

Also the number of applications made by the Attorney General to tht Federal Trade Commission for the investigation of corporations alleged to be violating the antitrust acts, as provided in section 5 of "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission," etc., approved September 26, 1914, together with the names of such corporations.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACCRATE. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I have been trying to find out myself, and I have been unable to do so as yet; but will the gentleman explain to the House how a farmer can be guilty of profiteering in the sale of his products which he raises on land owned or leased by him, and when he sells in the open market and buys in the open market?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

By unanimous consent Mr. MACCRATE was granted leave to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen [applause], I hope that there will not be any misunderstanding between the Congressmen from the cities and the gentlemen who come from the country districts over this bill. There will not be if they understand the bill. We had two weeks' hearings on this and the cold-storage proposition before the Committee on Agriculture, and I think we have gone into the facts concerning the matter pretty thoroughly. I overheard a gentleman say that he was going to vote against this bill because it exempted farmers from prosecution for destruction of food products. Now, if you will stop and think a moment, we are not here to talk about something that we do not know anything about or be for or against something we do not understand. The farmers of this Nation are asked this fall to seed a large wheat crop. I happen to know just a little about that personally. I know that if a man knows that when he seeds that crop he can not destroy it if he wants to next spring instead of harvesting it, that no man can afford to plant it. I want to make that clear. When I left home this spring our wheat fields in my section of the State looked as if they were going to be a success, but there are thousands of acres of wheat by reason of charge of climatic conditions that did not bear a harvest. But they want to make every bushel, all that they possibly could, but no farmer could afford to go to the expense of harvesting that wheat and save that food; it would ruin him. Well, without the exemption of this law he would be guilty, if he did not harvest and plow it under or use it in some way, of destroying a food crop. I want you to understand another proposition, and that is that there is not any way in the world of comparing a farmer holding his own products that he raises himself until he is ready to market them with the middleman who traffics in his products. [Applause.] But I want to say this: That the object of the Agricultural Committee in reporting this bill was not to favor the farmer but to encourage production; and men like Mr. FERRIS, from Oklahoma, and other men who came before the committee, called our attention to the fact that we must not enact legislation that would enable the farmer to be harassed and be bothered, but that we must encourage production, and I want to say that coming from a farming district I am proud of the fact that not a single witness even intimated that the Department of Justice should take up the case of the farmer and not a witness said that the farmer of the United States had since this Great War in any way profiteered. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman think anybody would hold that if the farmer planted a crop of rye in the fall and plowed it in the spring that that is destruction?

Mr. TINCHER. Before the Attorney General decided under the present law—the one we are amending today—before he decided that the farmer was exempt, as we are seeking to amend it to-day, I know the fact that administrators tried to have farmers put in jail for turning hogs in cornfields instead of gathering the corn. I say to you that it is not so much——

Mr. PLATT. But that does not answer the question.

Mr. TINCHER. No; I do not think it would. I do not think it was thought that would violate that law. Why should there be any misunderstanding with the farmer as to the attitude of this Congress toward him? Why not have it so that he will understand where we are? He is not accused of profiteering, and why have any misunderstanding about it?

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINCHER. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. If the farmer in the case of a wheat crop had turned it under and planted another crop before the season is gone for wheat, it is with the understanding of increasing the production, is it not?

Mr. TINCHER. Absolutely. Though you might get a man from the congested districts of New York who would think he ought to be put in jail, and there have been some district attorneys in some of the States since this law was passed—I will tell you of an example; they put some milkmen over here in Ohio in jail and kept them there, denied them bail, because under collective bargaining they were selling their milk to a dealer at 7 cents a quart when the dealer or retailer of the milk sold it at 16 cents a quart and they were not doing anything with him. The district attorney put the farmers who produced the milk in jail and did not interfere with the middlemen; I do not know why.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, after five minutes, can not we read another section, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. STRONG. I desire five minutes.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate conclude in 15 minutes; 10 minutes to go to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. HAUGEN. Say 20 minutes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Three minutes will do for me.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have an amendment, an important amendment, which I wish to offer to this section. It can not be offered to any other section, and I trust the gentleman will not foreclose this.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from New York is pending.

Mr. MACCRATE. I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may I inquire who is to get the 20 minutes?

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman from Ohio is to have 10 minutes, the gentleman from Alabama 5 minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] 5 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, we do not know what is contained in these proposed amendments. It might be very important. It might be our duty to have some discussion, and for that reason I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELTY] asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am just a trifle disappointed because the committee was not able to report a bill with a view of enacting permanent legislation to deal with the profiteers. The bill presented is simply an amendment to the war measures and can be in effect only during our transition from a war basis to peace times. I shall vote for this bill because it will give the Government added power to deal with the profiteers and send them to jail, where they can meditate. But I was disappointed to find that not one on the majority side saw fit to discuss the measure under consideration, but, instead, made this bill a vehicle for abuses against the administration.

Some few days ago, when the high cost of living became acute, there were Members who criticized the administration because the Sherman antitrust law had not been enforced, with a statement that there was no need of additional legislation. This morning the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG] opened the debate on this bill with a renewed attack on the administration, and contended that the Sherman antitrust law was all that was necessary, provided the Department of Justice would do its full duty. In the short time I have, I want to call the attention of the House to a few facts taken from the court dockets showing how the Sherman antitrust law has been working since the famous decision of the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases in May, 1911, at which time, it will be remembered, the Supreme Court held in these two cases that a reasonable restraint was not unlawful; that a trust or monopoly could not be found guilty so long as commerce was not unduly restrained. Just how much restraint is permissible under that decision no one knows; whether 5 per cent or 80 per cent is unlawful must be determined by the court. The Sherman antitrust law specifically declares that any restraint is unlawful, just as the law against stealing is declared unlawful. But since that famous decision we seem to have a new law. The court has usurped the power of Congress. Instead of passing upon acts of Congress it writes into law a new act, and thus makes the Sherman antitrust law of no effect unless the court at some future time sees fit to reverse itself and declare, as the law intended, that any restraint, no matter how small, is declared unlawful.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELTY. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. I understand the gentleman to say that the Sherman antitrust law has been a dead letter since 1912.

Mr. WELTY. Absolutely, unless the Supreme Court reverses itself in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases and takes the rule of reason out of this act.

Mr. GOOD. And the Democratic Party has been in control of both branches of the Congress since 1910, I believe, and had the President since 1912.

Mr. WELTY. Since 1913.

Mr. GOOD. And do you mean to say that your great party had done nothing in all that time to correct the evils, and place upon the statute book a real live law to prevent the combinations and corporations from doing those things that the Sherman antitrust law attempted to prevent?

Mr. RUCKER. No party in six years can undo all of the wrongs you have done in 20 years. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELTY. Well, I hope that you will not expect to hold the Democratic Party responsible for the appointment of reactionary judges before 1912. The country has been patiently waiting since that time for this court to reverse itself. The only time that it did properly interpret the Sherman antitrust law was in the Hatters case, where the rule of reason did not enter, because a number of workmen saw fit to strike in order to maintain a union shop. In that case the Supreme Court approved a fine which exceeded the value of all of the property these workmen had. The Democrats did pass an antitrust law after that decision, by passing the so-called Clayton Act in 1914, which in part provides "That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade, under the antitrust laws."

But the Congress had a right to believe that the Supreme Court would reverse itself in the cases of the rule of reason when passing upon acts of a monopoly, because of the sentiment in the country. Personally, I introduced a bill in the Sixty-fifth and Sixty-sixth Congresses providing a constitutional amendment making the judges appointive for a term of years instead of for life. It seems that the minute some of these judges are appointed for and during life, they withdraw themselves from the people and seem to cease to be in harmony with them and the Congress of the United States. However, I have been unable to procure any action from the Judiciary Committee on this bill. Because of the uncertain conditions that the court's decisions had placed the country in under the Sherman Act, the Department of Justice did not know what to do.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELTY. No; I have not the time. If you will give me more time I will yield. I do not usually take the time of the House.

Mr. McPHERSON. I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. WELTY. I will not yield, and the gentleman will please not interrupt me. I do not want to be discourteous, but I have some matters that I would like the House to know. To revert to my original intention, before I was interrupted by the gentleman from Iowa, who always attempts to interject politics and thus destroy much of his usefulness as a public servant. What I intended to call to the attention of the House was that since the promulgation of the rule of reason in the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases the Department of Justice nor anyone else knew what the Sherman antitrust law meant, regardless of its plain language. There would be just as much sense to a decision where the court would hold that a man can not be held guilty of stealing if he only stole a reasonable amount as to say reasonable restraint in commerce by a monopoly is not unlawful.

Permit me to give a history of the status of some of these trust cases and the action by the court as indicated from the docket since that famous decision. In the case of the United States against United States Steel Corporation and others, the petition was filed October 27, 1911, alleging a combination in restraint of interstate commerce in iron and steel and an attempt to monopolize the same. This case was argued before the circuit judges, under the provisions of the expediting act, during October, 1914. A decision adverse to the Government was handed down on June 3, 1915, and a decree dismissing the petition was entered September 10, 1915. From this decree an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court and is now pending. The same was argued in the Supreme Court in March, 1917, and restored to docket for reargument in May, 1917, and continued from time to time on account of war conditions.

Another case prosecuted by the Department of Justice was the case of the United States against Eastman Kodak Co. and others. In this case the petition was filed June 9, 1913, alleging that defendants have acquired a monopoly of all business of manufacturing, selling, and distributing photographic supplies. A decision favorable to the Government was handed down August 24, 1915, and a final decree was entered January 20, 1916. The defendants have appealed to the Supreme Court, and the same was docketed in May, 1916, but likewise continued, for some reason or other, from time to time.

Another case is the United States against American Can Co. and others, where the petition was filed November 29, 1913, charging defendants with having monopolized the sale of tin cans. A decision was handed down February 23, 1916, and the form of decree to be entered is now under consideration by the court. This case was docketed in the Supreme Court in November, 1916, but continued from time to time for some reason or other.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I ask the date of the docket the gentleman is reading from?

Mr. WELTY. I am reading from entries and pencil notations in the Federal antitrust laws with amendments.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The date these entries were made in the docket from which the gentleman is reading.

Mr. WELTY. The entries are pencil notations made a day or so ago after speeches were made on the floor claiming that no additional laws are necessary.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WELTY. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. I thought that the gentleman before the committee, in speaking of those cases, said they were continued by agreement of counsel.

Mr. WELTY. I do not think that I specifically mentioned any agreement of continuance in these cases, for I do not know. When I appeared before the Committee on Agriculture those cases especially referred to, that I thought were continued, were the cases against the Plumbers' Trust. I presume that probably these cases were also continued by agreement, especially after we entered the war. I am not holding a brief for the Department of Justice, and no doubt some of this delay was due to agreement on the part of attorneys for the Government and attorneys of the defendants, because neither knew just what the Sherman antitrust law meant after that famous decision granting the Standard Oil Co. an absolute monopoly to place any price it sees fit on its oil and gasoline.

Permit me to give a history of these additional cases charged with being a monopoly for the benefit of Congress, with a hope of throwing some little light upon this subject and procure justice for the consumer against the profiteer.

In the case of the United States against United Shoe Machinery Co. et al. the petition was filed December 12, 1911, alleging combinations and conspiracies in restraint of interstate and foreign trade in shoe machinery. Trial had March 18, 1915; appeal taken to Supreme Court, where the Government lost the case in May, 1918. I might add that Congress recently passed a resolution to investigate the Shoe Trust, which is extracting millions from those who must wear boots and shoes.

Another petition was filed by the Government against the United Shoe Machinery Co. et al., February 8, 1913, under the antitrust law.

In the case of the United States against The Keystone Watch Case Co. et al. the petition was filed December 20, 1911, alleging combinations and conspiracies to monopolize trade in watch-cases and watches. A decision in part favorable and in part adverse to the contentions of the Government was handed down January 2, 1915. Both the Government and defendants appealed to the Supreme Court. This will be argued during the October term, 1919.

In the case of the United States against The Quaker Oats Co. et al. the petition was filed June 11, 1913, alleging a combination to restrain and monopolize interstate trade and commerce in oatmeal products and by-products. This case was argued before the circuit judges in March, 1916, and decided adversely to the Government. An appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court, and the case probably will be heard early this fall.

Two suits have been filed by the Department of Justice charging a number of railroads and coal companies with restraining and monopolizing the trade of coal. The first one was filed against the Reading Co. and others, known as the anthracite coal combination, September 2, 1913. The last one was filed against the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. and others, March 18, 1914. This case was argued November, 1914, and petition dismissed December 21 of the same year. The entries in these cases are especially illuminating in the face of the high cost of living and attempts of Congress to solve the same. Case was argued in the Supreme Court October, 1916; restored to docket for reargument May, 1917; reargued November, 1917; restored to docket for reargument June, 1918; October, 1918, continued at the request of the Government on account of war conditions. It may be lese majeste to criticize the courts, but I think it is permissible to throw light upon their docket in order to prevent the running around in circles by those who are now trying to solve the high cost of living.

While in the Department of Justice I was assigned to prosecute the so-called Plumbers' Trust. Indictments were returned against 36, June 24, 1914, at Des Moines, Iowa, charging defendants with having entered into combinations of trade in plumbing supplies. They were found guilty February 24, 1915, 4 of them fined, and the case has been standing on motion for new trial as to 31 defendants pending decision on writ of error by court of appeals. This case was argued in court of appeals in January, 1916, and a decision is awaited.

Indictments were returned against 34 in Pennsylvania and 17 in Utah, and all of them convicted; but the cases have been continued from time to time waiting the decision in the court of appeals in the Iowa case. I might add other cases, but I do not care to encumber the RECORD further, for all are to the same effect, showing how natural it is for the Department of Justice to hesitate in the face of the decision of the Standard Oil and Tobacco cases.

About a year ago the Federal Trade Commission found that the five meat packers were a trust and monopoly. The Department of Justice at once sent the case to a district attorney at Chicago and employed a special counsel on this case, and since that time they have employed two additional attorneys who have been busy studying whether the restraint of the packers by keeping a billion and one-half pounds of meats in storage, for the purpose of boosting prices, is reasonable or unlawful.

It has been asserted repeatedly on the floor of the House that the United Fruit Co. has made 40 per cent profits during the last year after payment of all expenses, and that they had a complete monopoly in the sale of bananas and fruits. If this is so, this condition has been permitted because of the decision in the case of the rule of reason, even though children are starving because they are unable to pay the high prices for bananas and fruits.

I understand that all of these cases now on the docket will be up for consideration by the Supreme Court upon return from a prolonged vacation, but unless this court holds that the Steel Corporation, and the American Can Co., and the Eastman Kodak Co. are a monopoly, it would be asinine for the Department of Justice to incur additional expense with a hope of having the packers and the United Fruit Co. declared a monopoly under the Sherman antitrust law, as interpreted by the court in the case of the rule of reason.

Some months ago I prepared a bill which if enacted into law would drive the meats and foods out of cold storage because of the tax which they would be required to pay if the foodstuffs are held in cold storage after a certain period of time. Section 1 of the bill provides for a tax on "Beef, or the manufactures of or products thereof, after 6 months and less than 8 months in storage, 10 per cent of the selling price; longer than 8 months and less than 10 months, 15 per cent of the selling price; longer than 10 months and less than 12 months, 20 per cent of the selling price; longer than 12 months, 30 per cent of the selling price."

Section 8 provides a tax on "Eggs, or the manufactures of or products thereof, after 8 months and less than 10 months, 10 per cent of the selling price; after 10 months and less than 12 months, 20 per cent of the selling price; after 12 months, 30 per cent of the selling price."

The bill further provides that the date when the food goes into storage should be placed on the container and crate of the food so that we might know just how old the eggs are that we buy.

I do not know how long packers have stored meats in order to hold up the prices, but I remember distinctly that during the Spanish-American War these same food profiteers fed us on embalmed beef, which had a green, slimy appearance, and from the smell you would think that this meat was placed in storage shortly after they commenced business. It seems that this meat should have gone out of storage long before they had a chance to join our enemy in killing our boys who volunteered to maintain our country during that war.

It also seems that when eggs are in storage for 12 months they should come out of storage. I do hope that the Congress will pass some law to regulate our storage plants, but I am afraid that this amendment will have a tendency to postpone final action on these matters. You may play politics in this matter all you like, but I warn you that by doing so you will only repeat the acts of Nero when he fiddled while Rome was destroyed. Every nation in the past was destroyed because its people were crying for food and no food was in sight.

You may criticize the President of the United States, but the majority knows that they would have adjourned because they did not know what do, after they had repassed the appropriation bills which would have become a law during the Sixty-fifth Congress had they not been killed by a filibuster of a few Republicans in another Chamber. But when all is said and done you will find that Congress must grant some relief. No hope can come from the courts under the Sherman antitrust law unless the Supreme Court overrules the rule of reason and interprets each case according to the law and the facts.

I was hoping that because of the war we would not longer need to enforce the Sherman antitrust law; that labor and capital would become mutually helpful, with a spirit of brotherhood, and have reached a time where people are willing to live and let live; but it seems that we must use this powerful weapon and enact other laws to send a few of these grafters to the penitentiary before we can merge and enjoy the brotherhood of man. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STRONG of Kansas: Page 2, line 6, after the word "oil," insert the words "coal oil, gasoline."

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up any time on this matter, but it seems to me that coal oil and gasoline should be included in this bill. Those two articles have gone up 300 per cent in the last two years, and I think the Government should be given an opportunity to take action on those two articles that are used so much by our people.

Mr. FESS. I may be in error, but is not that a part of the original law?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I do not know. I would like to ask the chairman if they are in the original law.

Mr. FESS. I think they are in the original law.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I understood the chairman to say that they are not in it. I would like to ask the chairman a question. The amendment I have just offered includes coal oil and gasoline. Are those two articles included in the original bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. Not gasoline.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Then I think they should be included in this bill.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. Are not coal oil and gasoline fuel? Fuel is in here. Does not that cover it?

Mr. BUTLER. Gasoline is not fuel.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think we should proceed with some deliberation in a matter of this kind. Section 12 of the act——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The time for debate on this question was limited to two minutes, was it not?

Mr. VENABLE. That was objected to.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will read to the gentleman the definition of "necessaries."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. HAUGEN. The bill reads:

To facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, and fuel, including fuel oil and natural gas, and fertilizer and fertilizing ingredients, tools, implements, machinery, and equipment required for the production of foods, feeds, and fuel.

It does not include coal oil or gasoline.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In section 12 the President is authorized, if he finds it necessary, to secure an adequate supply of necessaries for the support of the Army and the maintenance of the Navy, or for any other object in connection with the public defense. He is authorized to requisition or take over for the use and operation of the Government any factory, packing house, oil well, mine, or other plant or any part thereof in or through which any necessary may be manufactured, produced, or prepared or mined, and operate the same.

Mr. HAUGEN. To commandeer for the use of the Army and Navy.

Mr. FESS. Would not the word "fuel" include gasoline?

Mr. HAUGEN. No.

Mr. GARRETT. Do I understand the gentleman from Iowa is about to accept the amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. No; I am not accepting the amendment. We have carried out the suggestions of the Attorney General in so far as possible, with the one exception—that we exempt the farmer, with respect to the products of his farm, from the penalty of section 4, so that he may dispose of them in any way he desires. The question of including gasoline was thrashed out for days and days when the original food-control bill was enacted in 1917. The conferees discussed its inclusion until 3 o'clock or 4 o'clock in the morning on several occasions. An honest effort was made to include gasoline, but it was rejected. I would support the proposition under different circumstances, but it may delay the passage if it is included in the bill now, as I understand there would be considerable opposition to it; besides, it would scarcely be enforced before the act terminates by the President's proclamation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that the President issued a proclamation on September 16, 1918, in which he covered this very subject?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The proclamation of the President states, among other things, that "all persons, firms, corporations, and associations engaged in business as (b) manufacturers of fuel oil, gas oil, kerosene or gasoline," and so forth, are all put under the control of the Government.

Mr. GARRETT. And this bill does not change that?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; and this proclamation of the President will remain as long as the law stands on the statute books.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask if that proclamation does not refer to the commandeering for the use of the Government? This refers to the sale of supplies to the people. Is it not for the use of the Government that the commandeering is done?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no.

Mr. TREADWAY. If I may be allowed to state it, an effort is being made now to describe fuel as including gasoline and coal oil, and it seems to me that anything in as general use as gasoline ought to be included.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; this proclamation is as follows:

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, by virtue of the powers conferred on me by said act of Congress, hereby find and determine and by this proclamation do announce that it is essential in order to carry into effect the purposes of said act, to license the importation, manufacture, storage, and distribution of certain necessaries to the extent hereinafter specified:

All persons, firms, corporations, and associations engaged in business as—

(a) Importers of crude oil, fuel oil, gas oil, kerosene or gasoline;
(b) Manufacturers of fuel oil, gas oil, kerosene or gasoline;
(c) Distributors or marketers of crude oil, fuel oil, gas oil, kerosene or gasoline;
(d) Transporters of crude oil, fuel oil, gas oil, kerosene or gasoline (except those specifically exempted by said act of Congress).

It specifically includes gasoline.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to address the House.

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask for a vote.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. MONDELL. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of this amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, that motion is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAUGEN) there were—ayes 44, noes 40.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. HAUGEN and Mr. GARRETT.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 61.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HUDDLESTON: Page 2, line 4, after the word "food," insert "dwellings and dwelling rooms held for hire."

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment is to recognize the necessity for lowering the rental price of dwellings. A dwelling is a necessity of life. Profiteering in rents is just as oppressive as profiteering in food. [Applause.] It has occasioned and is occasioning great suffering on the part of our people. Rents are being ballooned to the sky. Every Member of Congress has suffered from extortionate rentals in Washington. We are suffering from it here in Washington and our constituents are suffering at home. The country is far behind in building. Very little, if any, building, except the most absolutely necessary, has been done for the past three or four years. Practically all of our cities are overpopulated. There are not places in the cities, especially in the industrial cities, where people may find shelter. Avaricious landlords are taking advantage of this situation to wring the very last penny that they can out of their tenants. One of the greatest causes for discontent, especially upon the part of the laboring people, who are in the main of the tenant class, is the extortionate prices demanded for a place for a man and his family to live. Rents have gone up until the man who works for a modest salary or for small wages can scarcely find a decent place to lay his head. It used to be that a man of small means could get a habitation for from $12 to $25 a month, but now the same kind of houses and rooms that he used to be able to get for from $12 to $25 have gone up to from $50 to $75. The people can not live with this extortion that is being practiced upon them. No wonder they are discontented. No wonder we find a loud outcry going up because of the extortion that is being practiced. Congress has it in its power to remedy this situation. Congress is now dealing with this subject—it is, perhaps, the last chance we will have. If we fail now the people will know where to place the blame.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman seriously think Congress can regulate the price of rooms in Atlanta, Ga.?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Certainly. The gentleman was not here this morning——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; I was.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. When I referred the House to a decision of the United States Supreme Court which held that in the exercise of the war powers of Congress we could pass laws which would be operative for a reasonable time after peace is proclaimed. Congress under its war powers may pass any law deemed to be needful and necessary in order to restore order in this country, to satisfy the people, and to heal up the wounds that they suffered on account of the war. We can limit rents just as well as prices on food.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am referring specifically to matters that are within the jurisdiction of municipalities.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Congress has exactly the same right to regulate rentals that it has to regulate prices on flour and bacon.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I confess that is a new doctrine.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. We can do it; we have done it. We can do it in the exercise of the war powers of Congress, and this morning I referred to the authorities. I did not amplify the matter by reading from the authorities for lack of time, but I referred to several authorities which demonstrate that this power of Congress does not end immediately with the proclamation of peace. It continues for a reasonable time thereafter until the effects of war have passed, until the country is pacified, until high prices which have arisen out of the peculiar conditions of the war have passed away.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. Congress unquestionably has the power, not under the war power but vested in itself, to prescribe reasonable rentals for the District of Columbia, has it not?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GARD. And should do so.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. And should do so.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not yield. Congress has the undoubted power to do this in the District of Columbia. It has the undoubtable power to do it over the country, and if Congress fails to do this work, it is failing in a duty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I regret to do so, but I must object.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the life of this bill probably will not extend over a period of more than two or three months. The committee has had a number of suggestions under consideration. Many of the suggestions undoubtedly have merit, but the most important feature to be considered is to expedite the passage of the bill. It must be passed immediately if it is to be of any value whatever. If we undertake to amend this bill we might as well strike out everything after the enacting clause. It proposes to give relief to the country. It is believed that this bill will give the desired effect. If you do not wish to give the relief, then amend the bill, and in that way defeat it. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I have a real amendment that I want to offer.

Mr. HAUGEN. In 15 minutes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Very well.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes, 5 minutes to each gentleman [Mr. HOWARD and Mr. CARAWAY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am indeed glad that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has introduced this amendment and certainly hope that the conditions are such that it will soon be enacted into law. There is no class of profiteering in this country from which wage earners and people who are unfortunate enough not to own their own homes are suffering as the action of the rent hogs in the matter of renting dwelling places to those who are forced to rent. That thing is going on right under the dome of this Capitol, and I want to call the attention of the Congress and of the people to a concrete case of rent profiteering which has come to my knowledge. I brought with me when I came to Washington a young woman from Oklahoma to be my secretary. She was a young woman who had been bereft of her father and had her mother to care for. After having been in the city of Washington for about three weeks, although she had lived in a country where commercial conditions were good and where the cost of living was high, she was amazed when the only apartment that she could find in which to live with her mother in the city of Washington was a little three-room flat, with a kitchenette and a bathroom, for which she was charged the sum of $75 a month. She accepted it—she had to. She had to have a place to live. A few days ago she met the people who had occupied that apartment for six years previous to that time, and I have here the papers showing the methods by which the rent hogs in the city of Washington impose on the Government employees, setting out that these people who occupied that apartment for six years had done so at a rental of only $26 per month, and I ask that the Clerk read those papers in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 19, 1919.

Mr. L. R. MEREDITH,
Apartment No. 22, No. 2164 Florida Avenue NW.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As we are desirous to have again and repossess the apartment and premises, which you now hold of us as tenant, known as apartment No. 22 in the Newport, No. 2164 Florida Avenue NW., Washington, D. C., we hereby give you notice to remove from and quit said premises on the 1st day of May, 1919.

Yours, very truly,

PERCY H. RUSSELL CO. (INC.)
By PERCY H. RUSSELL.

This is to certify that I occupied apartment No. 22, the Newport, 2164 Florida Avenue NW., Washington, D. C., from October 1, 1911, until November 1, 1917, at the rate of $25 per month, and from November 1, 1917, until May 1, 1919, at the rate of $26 per month.

(Signed) L. R. MEREDITH.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 19th day of August, 1919.
My commission expires May 26, 1924.
[SEAL.]

W. G. BADEN,
Notary Public.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I asked for 10 minutes when I started.

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from Iowa superseded that of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will that be taken out of the time allotted for the debate?

The CHAIRMAN. It will not. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, under the dome of the Capitol, a Government employee moved into that house on May 12, after these people had been ordered to move out on May 1, when they had been renting the house for $26 per month. By reason of necessity, because she had to have some place to live, the Government employee was compelled to pay a rental of $75 a month. I do not know to what extent that condition prevails in Washington. I would not even apply to these people the word "profiteers," because I have not made an investigation of the conditions surrounding the apartment in question. I do know, however, that we have been criticized for raising the salaries of Government employees. I do know that we have been criticized for passing bonus bills, and I do know that a Government employee or any other is entitled to more than even food, rent, and clothing; and if these rent hogs are to continue, such as this case evidences, no doubt we will be called upon to care for our employees again. I do not say that these people are profiteers, but I submit to this Congress that they were either philanthropists on May 1 and the six years before or are profiteers to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer, but I presume we will first have to dispose of the amendment now pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. HUDDLESTON) there were—ayes 76, noes 47.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. HUDDLESTON and Mr. HAUGEN to act as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 63.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer to amend, on page 2, lines 4 and 5, by striking out, after the word "feeds," the words "wearing apparel, containers primarily designed or intended for containing foods," and insert those same words after the word "fuel" in line 9.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 4 and 5, after the word "feeds," strike out the words "wearing apparel, containers primarily designed or intended for containing foods," and, in line 9, page 1, after the word "fuel," insert the words "wearing apparel, containers primarily designed or intended for containing foods."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I am just transposing the language. I want merely to clarify the statement. If the committee will look at the language, it reads thus, commencing in line 2:

To assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, wearing apparel, containers primarily designed or intended for containing foods—

And so forth. That language as it is now only permits the regulation of the containers for foods, feeds, and fertilizers and fuel, including fuel oil and natural gas and fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients, tools, utensils, and so forth.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will.

Mr. RUBEY. I think the gentleman is right, in that the language there is very indefinite and confusing, but I believe that it can be removed by putting after the word "fertilizers" in line 5 a semicolon.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the gentleman will pardon me there, you can transpose the language from line 9 and put it after "fuel" and there will be no question about it, and it will read this way: "for the actual production of foods, feeds, and fuel, wearing apparel, containers"—I have struck out the words——

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will.

Mr. GARD. It seems to me that unless the gentleman qualifies the amendment he has in mind it does not benefit the bill, and it merely applies to implements required in the production of foods, feeds, and fuel.

Mr. CARAWAY. The gentleman from Ohio is correct; and the amendment ought to be inserted after "machinery" in line 7. The only desire I have is that you have the right to regulate the containers for all these things we really want to regulate.

Mr. GARD. By inserting it after the word "machinery," I think it will meet the object desired to be accomplished.

Mr. CARAWAY. I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by inserting those words after "machinery" instead of after "fuel."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARAWAY: On page 2, line 4, after the word "feeds," strike out "wearing apparel, containers primarily designed or intended for containing foods"; and in line 7, after the word "machinery," insert the same identical language.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I object to the modification. The language obviously does not apply there.

Mr. CARAWAY. Where would the gentleman suggest that it be applied? I have no kind of desire to interfere with the arrangement of the phrasing of the bill, except I want to enable the committee to say without any ambiguity the thing I know is in their mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to modify the amendment as reported by the Clerk. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. CARAWAY. I withdraw my amendment and will offer it again.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Arkansas withdraws his amendment.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not have to have unanimous consent to withdraw an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then I want recognition to offer an amendment, unless the gentleman wants to offer it himself.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I was going to speak on the amendment, but if it is withdrawn——

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to reoffer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. ANDERSON. The original amendment is still pending.

Mr. CARAWAY. I withdrew it.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman can not withdraw it without unanimous consent.

Mr. CARAWAY. I can do it without unanimous consent; I can not modify without unanimous consent, but I can withdraw it without it. I do not need the gentleman's help at all.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Now, I think it should be "containers containing foods, feeds, or fertilizers"; those three words.

Mr. CARAWAY. The amendment was withdrawn. I now wish to offer the amendment after the word "machinery," which was offered a minute ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "feeds," strike out "wearing apparel, containers primarily designed or intended for containing foods," and insert, after the word "machinery," "wearing apparel, containers primarily designed or intended for containing foods."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HAUGEN. I reserve one minute of time.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the gentleman from Arkansas seeks to accomplish by his amendment, but the amendment which he seeks to have adopted clearly ought not to be adopted. It proposes to insert "wearing apparel, containers primarily designed or intended for containing foods, feeds, and fertilizers," after the word "machinery," in line 7. Now, in reading lines 7 and 8, it is as follows:

Tools, utensiles, implements, machinery, and equipment required for the actual production of foods, feeds, and fuel—

And so forth.

Now, of course, wearing apparel is not primarily designed and required for the actual production of foods, feeds, and so forth, and therefore it is perfectly clear that the language ought not to be inserted in the position which the gentleman seeks to insert it.

Now, there is another reason why the language ought to be left exactly as it is. The committee reported the language exactly in the place and in the words which the Attorney General requested. It ought to be adopted that way, because the Attorney General ought to have what he asked for, and the committee endeavored to give him what he asked for, and the House ought to give him what he asked for. If we adopt the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas, neither the House or anyone else knows what he is getting.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Did the Attorney General ask to exempt farmers from the provisions of this bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. He said he had no objection to doing so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then I do not think much of the Attorney General's desire to cut down the cost of living.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in your report of the bill as proposed by the Attorney General it uses the language "wearing apparel, containers in which foods, feeds, fertilizers are sold."

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman is simply jumping at conclusions, because he has not taken the trouble to read the report; and if he will take the trouble to read it he will find the Attorney General made no objection to the language. On the contrary, he thought it was better than the language which he proposed.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. If this language was used, it would obviate the trouble.

Mr. ANDERSON. Whose language?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The Attorney General's.

Mr. ANDERSON. Not at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes' time.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the time for the debate has been arranged. How much time is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. One minute.

Mr. HAUGEN. I reserve one minute.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert a comma after the word "war," on line 1, page 2. It is a typographical error. Also, to insert a comma after the word "movement," in line 3, page 2.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his amendment again?

Mr. HAUGEN. I move to insert a comma after the word "war," in line 1, page 2. That is the punctuation used in the original act. It was overlooked.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAUGEN: Page 2, line 1, after the word "war," insert a comma. And in line 3, after the word "movement," insert a comma.

Mr. LAYTON. You do not want a comma after the word "movement."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, what became of the other amendment?

Mr. GARD. Surely you do not want a comma after the word "movement."

Mr. HAUGEN. It is in the original act.

Mr. GARD. It is all right after the word "war," but not after the word "movement."

Mr. HAUGEN. I withdraw it, and ask for the other amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman withdraws his amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. The amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] is pending, is it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The question arises on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I understood the gentleman from Iowa withdrew the last amendment, namely, to insert a comma after the word "movement," but he did not withdraw the amendment providing for a comma after the word "war," and that amendment is left undisposed of. It should be disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. He withdrew the latter part of it.

Mr. HAUGEN. The amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] has to be disposed of first.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] for recognition for two minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I want the attention of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY], because I thought he was desiring to make a suggestion. I got time as much for him as for myself.

Mr. RUBEY. I was going to simply suggest the putting of a semicolon after the word "fertilizers," in line 5. It would clarify the whole thing.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is that the gentleman's belief?

Mr. RUBEY. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the gentleman wants to offer that amendment, I will withdraw the one I have offered.

Mr. RUBEY. In my opinion that would clarify the whole matter.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am rather doubtful about it, but I am going to yield my judgment to the gentleman from Missouri, a member of the committee. I withdraw the amendment I offered, and the gentleman can offer his.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to insert a semicolon after the word "fertilizers," in line 5.

Mr. HAUGEN. I accept the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. And I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Arkansas withdraws his amendment, and the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RUBEY: Page 2, line 5, after the word "fertilizers," strike out the comma and insert a semicolon.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the second amendment. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota: Page 2, line 4, after the word "apparel," insert "raw cotton."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, it is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] on the point of order. Does he insist on his point of order?

Mr. HAUGEN. At first I thought it was not germane, but perhaps it may be.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order against it, Mr. Chairman. This bill certainly does not provide for anything except food and fuel.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the bill provides for foods, feeds, fuel, and wearing apparel.

Mr. BLANTON. Raw cotton is not wearing apparel, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not, but——

Mr. BLANTON. Will the Chair hear me?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. This bill seeks to control the price of foods and feeds and fuel and their containers, and clothing and shoes, but it does not in any way embrace raw materials, and especially raw cotton, which is merely an element of clothing. For instance, fuel could embrace gasoline and oil, and yet an amendment was offered to embrace gasoline and oil and was voted down by this committee.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. It is not germane, Mr. Chairman, to the purposes of this bill, and I make a point of order against it.

Mr. LAYTON. If the gentleman will yield to me for a moment, I want to suggest that a live hog is not food. It has to be killed first. Neither is a grain of wheat a loaf of bread. Cotton enters into clothing.

Mr. BLANTON. Raw cotton does not come within the purposes of this bill. It is not germane, and I make the point of order against it. One of the main purposes of this bill is to protect the producer and to encourage him in greater production, and we want the actual producer to get all he can for his products. It protects him in that it speaks of the right of the farmers and producers of food and as producers of some products which go into wearing apparel, shoes, and clothing to engage in collective bargaining, the same right that the laborers of the land now have. My good friend would not think of taking that right away from the laborers of the land. The farmer is a laborer of the land and a producer of the country, and one of the prime purposes of this bill as reported by the committee is to encourage the producer, while this proposed amendment would discourage him, and raw cotton is one product of the producer. It is still in the hands of the producers, the farmers who raise it as raw cotton, and it would be inconsistent with the purpose of this bill to include it in one of the limitations.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Do you raise any cotton in Texas?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; and you have collective bargaining among the laborers of New York, and the gentleman from New York would be very glad to protect them here. This proposed amendment is clearly subject to the point of order I have made against it, and I respectfully submit the question to the Chair for decision.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I submit to the Chair that there can be no question but that this amendment is germane to the provisions of this bill. It includes fuel and clothing, and it includes practically everything, fertilizer and rents, all the necessities of life. If room rent and fertilizer are germane to this bill—and they are, apparently—it seems to me that raw cotton, one of the very essentials, an essential in every home, would be. There is not a child in the United States to-day whose necessities do not require cotton every day, just as they require food.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Do children wear cotton or cotton clothes?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Children do not use fertilizer, yet it is included in this bill. This bill is to insure an adequate supply of clothing. Clothing is made of raw cotton.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. VENABLE. Has the gentleman any objection to putting in raw wool?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. None whatever.

Mr. VENABLE. And wheat?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Wheat is already in.

Mr. VENABLE. And corn?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No.

The CHAIRMAN. To the Chair the point of order is well taken and is sustained. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 4 of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"That it is hereby made unlawful for any person willfully to destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof; knowingly to commit waste or willfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in or in connection with their production, manufacture, or distribution; to hoard, as defined in section 6 of this act, any necessaries; to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any necessaries; to engage in any discriminatory and unfair, or any deceptive or wasteful practice or device, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries; to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person; (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict distribution of any necessaries; (d) to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof; or (e) to exact excessive prices for any necessaries, or to aid or abet the doing of any act made unlawful by this section. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section upon conviction thereof shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, horticulturist, vineyardist, planter, ranchman, dairyman, stockman, or other agriculturist, with respect to the farm products produced or raised upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by him: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to forbid or make unlawful collective bargaining by any cooperative association or other association of farmers, dairymen, gardeners, or other producers of farm products with respect to the farm products produced or raised by its members upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by them."

Mr. McCULLOCH, Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania, Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota, and Mr. GRIFFIN rose.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCULLOCH: Page 3, line 1, after the word "person," insert "officer or public official."

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment for the purpose of getting into the RECORD, in connection with the debate on this bill, facts which I regard as most important and which disclose a peculiar situation. The truth is, the President of the United States has now, and has had for months, the power to do practically all that is necessary to be done, according to his own statement, to take care of food profiteers, of food hoarding, and this high cost of living situation. [Applause on the Republican side.] The fact that he has that power is shown by the letter of the Attorney General in which he points out what they desire Congress to do in the way of extending further powers to the President. All they ask is that the powers be extended to cover wearing apparel, and containers of various kinds, and that the penalties be increased. It is admitted by the President, and everybody else, that the Executive branch of the Government has had the power all along to deal with food hoarders and food profiteers, and to punish all guilty of such offenses. The fact that these powers have not been exercised is not the fault of Congress.

If it is really necessary to have additional legislation in order to effectively prosecute those guilty of hoarding food and profiteering in the necessaries of life, I, of course, am in favor of such legislation. I am also in favor of invoking the criminal sections of Federal and State statutes in prosecuting such offenders, and I believe that prison sentences will be more effective than fines.

There are, however, certain phases of the program as announced by the Attorney General for dealing with the food situation with which I am not in accord. During the war it was probably necessary to centralize authority and to extend to the Executive branch of the Government the power to create agencies, not only to supervise, but to direct with autocratic authority the manufacture, purchase, sale, and transportation of certain products. As the result of legislation granting such authority we had a food director, a fuel director, a grain director, and many other directors. Sometimes they were called dictators, and their powers were supposed to be unlimited. Their orders disrupted and disorganized in a great measure the industries of the country. It stands to reason that arbitrary orders issued promiscuously are bound to disrupt to a greater or less degree. I believe that these artificial interferences should now be removed, the emergency having passed, and that we should strive to get back to normal as speedily as possible, rather than to add to the confusion by creating additional dictators and directors, continuing to interfere with the normal operation of the natural, fundamental laws of trade.

It seems to me that a careful analysis of the situation will disclose that present conditions are the natural result of certain well-defined and basic causes.

First. The abnormal conditions that resulted from the war, labor scarcity, great demand for products, disorganization of business, and all of the many temporary changes in our economic policy, which it will take some time to readjust, must be recognized as one of the basic causes. Second, the great demand for food by foreign countries and the large amount of food that was exported. The exports of bread materials increased 50 per cent in one year, exports of meat and dairy products increased almost 70 per cent in one year. Everyone who will stop and analyze the situation must conclude that this increased demand would necessarily affect American prices.

Third. The opportunity that the war offered for a getting together of the producers, wholesalers, and retailers, which could not but result in the fixing of prices and in agreements in restraint of trade, all of which were without a doubt in violation of the Federal antitrust laws and the antitrust laws of the various States.

We can take care of the first cause by removing these artificial interferences, eliminating the dictators and confining governmental supervision to a strict enforcement of regulatory laws enacted for the purpose of preventing unlawful practices, such as agreements in restraint of trade.

We can eliminate the second cause to a great extent, if necessary, by embargoes upon foreign shipments, by a policy of America first, which is contrary in every respect to the altruistic view expressed and put into force by the Executive branch of our present Government. That policy has been to look after Europe first and America afterwards. The solicitude of the Executive branch of the Government has been for foreign countries and an astonishing disregard has been evidenced for the welfare of America.

The third cause can be removed and taken care of by a ruthless prosecution of those who are guilty of profiteering and food hoarding, and putting into effective operation the Federal and State antitrust laws.

FOOD HOARDERS.

The President of the United States appeared before Congress urging legislation that would effectively prevent profiteering and food hoarding. If newspaper accounts can be relied upon, great activity is now being evidenced on the part of the Department of Justice in the prosecution of profiteers and food hoarders. A high executive official has recently been quoted as saying that if a few of the food hoarders and profiteers can be sent to jail all will be well. So they are going out into the highways and byways and they are seeking out the little merchant and they are preparing to make an example of him, but not one word has been said in criticism of the greatest food hoarder the world has ever known, if the testimony and the reports that are before this House at the present time are correct.

Now, the situation that I want to bring to the attention of the House is this: On July 28, 1919, the select committee investigating expenditures in the War Department submitted a report, signed by 10 members of the committee, in which a charge was made that the Secretary of War and the War Department were hoarding food, and in which it was directly charged that the War Department had entered into an agreement with the canners of the country for the purpose of keeping up the price of food products to the American people and to prevent the breaking of the market. I am going to read a few sentences from the report:

Actuated by this condition, Gen. Peyton C. March, Chief of Staff, on November 30, 1918 (19 days after the armistice), issued an order authorizing the declaration of a surplus on all perishable food products.

The next step was the declaration of surplus by the Quartermaster General; and the last step was the sale of the surplus supplies by the Director of Sales. Notwithstanding the authorization of surplus by the Chief of Staff on the 30th of November, no action was taken with reference to declaring a surplus until the month of May, 1919, or six months after the declaration was authorized. In the meantime the food was deteriorating and becoming of less value to the Government, and the high cost of living for the American people continued. This inexcusable delay resulted in the spoiling of millions of pounds of ham and bacon, to the great loss of the Government and the people, who were in need of the meat food products. The inactivity of the Government in the disposition of these food supplies was, and is, the result of a well-defined policy of the Secretary of War to withhold them from the domestic market and to protect the interests from which these products had been purchased, with the ultimate intention of disposing of them abroad so far as circumstances would permit.

This policy finds expression not only in the testimony given to the committee by the officers of the War Department but in documentary evidence as well. As an instance of such intention to prevent the American people from purchasing these products, the Quartermaster General's department, through Gen. R. E. Wood, Quartermaster General, entered into an agreement with the canners' association that some 200,000,000 cans of canned vegetables would be kept off the domestic market during this season; this agreement was subsequently extended by an order of the Quartermaster General adding these canned vegetables to the soldiers' ration in the expressed hope that they would be entirely consumed and that none would be left for sale. This order would have resulted in a loss to the Government of millions of dollars to be derived from the sale of this surplus, as well as depriving the American people of a large quantity of food.

The purpose, as shown by the testimony, was to protect the canners who had sold the produce from competition with the governmental surplus.

On July 8, 1919, the surplus food stored in the United States over and above the needs of the Army was as follows:

Corn beef	$24,000,000
Bacon	23,000,000
Hash, corn beef	10,000,000
Roast beef	20,500,000
Fresh frozen meats and poultry	20,000,000
Canned vegetables	23,000,000

This surplus is constantly growing larger because of the continued demobilization of the Army. In addition to these items, there is a surplus of millions of cans of fish and milk and tons of sugar, coffee, and tea. It is utterly impossible to estimate the exact value of the tremendous quantity of food supplies in the hands of the department, a large portion of which is deteriorating and becoming less valuable.

During the eight months which has elapsed since the signing of the armistice only $12,000,000 of food supplies has been sold by the War Department in the United States, and a very large quantity of that sold was spoiled and unfit for the general market; otherwise it would not have been placed on sale.

In the face of the emergency which called for a special message to Congress from the President of the United States, in which he recommended that food hoarders and profiteers be prosecuted, with this report before him containing the startling charge that the Secretary of War was holding and hoarding this immense amount of food, and that he had entered into an agreement with the canners of the country to keep the prices of food up, in the face of all this we have not heard a single word in criticism of the Secretary of War or his policy, and no action whatever has been taken by the President or anybody else, so far as the public has been advised, toward investigating the charge or disciplining the Secretary of War. What can be expected of the individual when an example is set by an Executive department of the Government of this kind. Is there anything in this bill that will prevent a Government agency from hoarding food? Is there anything in this bill that will prevent a Government official from doing what a private individual is and should be so roundly condemned for doing? Why has not the Secretary of War been called upon either to refute the charge that has been made and exonerate himself or tender his resignation? We are told that this food is now being distributed, but it is being distributed under the direction of an official who has been charged in a report, signed by 10 Members of this House, with having entered into an agreement to hold the food and not place it upon the market, in order that prices might be kept up. The Secretary of War should be either called upon to exonerate himself and his department from this charge or he should be replaced, and it is to say the least inconsistent for the President of the United States to demand the prosecution of individuals and to protect a member of his own Cabinet, who it is charged is engaged in the same practice, only on a mammoth scale. All who are guilty should be punished.

A committee of Congress finds, after extended hearings, that a Government department is the greatest food hoarder in the world; that charge is made upon the floor of the House in a report signed by 10 Members of Congress, but nothing is done about it.

PROFITEERS.

Not only have we an example of a Government department hoarding food in the face of an emergency that has no equal in the history of the Republic, but we find that a Government agency, acting under the authority vested in the President of the United States by Congress, has been profiteering at the expense of the consumers of bread. Some days ago I had printed in the RECORD correspondence which passed between the grain director, Mr. Julius H. Barnes, and myself, in which he admitted that his corporation, a Government agency, had added a profit each month for the corporation to the price of wheat. He admitted that during the month of April as much as 17 cents a bushel over and above the price paid to the farmer was added to the price of wheat as profit for a Government agency. This correspondence shows that this Government agency has been able to carry to earned surplus over $23,000,000, the net profit over and above all expenses of the corporation, including armies of inspectors going about over the country at Government expense, the expenses of a large organization, storage charges and interest, and a profit on turnover. Is there anything in this bill that will prevent this Government agency from profiteering at the expense of the producers and the consumers of the country?

Profiteering by a Government agency to any amount should be stopped at once. Food hoarding by the Government for the purpose of protecting the market for dealers by holding the price up should be stopped, and the official or officials should be punished who have been guilty of such an un-American act. Then let the President, through the Department of Justice, with the Government's own hands clean, go after the corporate and individual food hoarder and profiteer by exercising the powers granted by Congress months ago. If legislation and the putting into force of powers granted by legislation will relieve the high cost of living, then the President alone is responsible for the present situation, because he has had almost unlimited powers for many months.

The following letter and clipping referred to shows that the United States Grain Corporation carried to earned surplus $23,763,320.93 at their last meeting:

NEW YORK, July 3, 1919.

Hon. ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In order that you may be promptly advised of the result of the 22 months of operation of the Food Administration Grain Corporation, which on July 1 became the United States Grain Corporation, and in order that the statement may be fully placed before you, I venture to inclose you clipping of the press release covering the result of the meeting of the stockholders and of the new directors.

You will note that the directors feel justified in carrying forward as earned surplus $23,763,320.93, which surplus, together with the original capital stock of $150,000,000, in addition to the appropriation carried in the act of March 4, 1919, will be used in administering the wheat guaranty.

You will recall that for the crop year 1917–18 the Grain Corporation was directed to stabilize wheat at the fair price recommended by the independent price commission, which it succeeded in doing, and for the crop year 1918–19 was directed to make effective the guaranty price for that crop, which it has succeeded in doing without loss. With these obligations rested also the duty of furthering the supply of necessary foodstuffs to our Allies and for our own Army and Navy, without domestic price disturbance, and also to so facilitate the equal distribution at home that the supplies available should be made to cover these home and foreign needs.

We lay especial emphasis on having planned the past operations of the Grain Corporation not with the primary purpose of profit earning, but to carry out these necessary national policies, and, at the same time, to conduct its business in a sound manner.

We shall need on your part a measure of sympathetic consideration in relation to our efforts in this coming year to make effective the national guaranty to the producer and to market the possible accumulations therefrom in a fair and just manner.

Yours, truly,

JULIUS H. BARNES.

GRAIN CORPORATION EARNS NET SURPLUS OF $23,000,000—ANNUAL MEETING HELD AT CORPORATION'S OFFICES—WAR UNDERTAKING CHANGES CORPORATE IDENTITY IN PREPARATION FOR HANDLING 1919–1920 WHEAT CROP—MADE PROFIT FOR UNITED STATES.

America's most gigantic war undertaking yesterday changed its identity as the Food Administration Grain Corporation and undertook the task of handling the 1919 wheat crop for the coming year under the new corporate title of the United States Grain Corporation, with a capital of $500,000,000.

At the annual meeting of stockholders with the president, Julius Barnes, United States Wheat Director, held in the corporation's offices, 42 Broadway, reports of work accomplished revealed the Grain Corporation not only as a war body which had paid all of its own expenses and operated at a small profit rather than a loss, but also as perhaps the greatest commercial undertaking in the world in regard to the volume of business handled.

Upon the suggestion of the executive committee of the Grain Corporation, the stockholders adopted the recommendation that the organization was justified in carrying forward as earned surplus the equivalent of 6 per cent on capital supplied by the United States of $10,191,666.64 and earnings of one-half of 1 per cent net on $1,800,000,000 worth of commodities handled, amounting to $9,000,000. This recommendation was made after setting aside a reserve for contingent liabilities, such as fire insurance, which the Grain Corporation carries on its own stocks, and the necessary adjustment of outstanding obligations in European relief.

A total of funds returned by mills as refund of excess profits over the regulated amounts of the 1917–18 crop year, amounting to $4,571,654.29, was also carried into earned surplus, making a total carried forward to net surplus earned amounting to $23,763,320.93.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I have tried all day to get an opportunity to speak against the entire bill. I tried to get a copy of the bill yesterday, and while in the office of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] I found that it was not numbered. It is brought here to-day by a report from the Rules Committee.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. VENABLE. I object.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Reserving the right to object, may I ask if anybody opposed to this bill will have an opportunity to make a speech?

Mr. SEARS. I object to the request of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAUGEN. I move that all debate on this section and all amendments close in 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes. This motion is not debatable.

Mr. IGOE. I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. IGOE. Has there been any debate on this section?

The CHAIRMAN. There has.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I think not—on this section.

Mr. IGOE. I make the point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH] has spoken on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McCULLOCH] has spoken five minutes on this section. The motion is in order.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GRIFFIN) there were—ayes 94, noes 21.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: Page 3, line 23, strike out the word "or" at the beginning of the line and insert the word "and."

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have offered my amendment to this food-control bill in order to make sure that every man convicted under it shall serve a term in prison. I believe that these traffickers who thrive on the sufferings of the people will not be kept from perpetrating their crimes against the common welfare by the imposition of a fine. I believe that the message which should be sent out by the passage of this bill is that Congress proposes prison bars for food profiteers. The bill itself provides a penalty of fine or imprisonment. I would make it both fine and imprisonment.

Mr. Chairman, I represent one of the greatest industrial districts in this country, and yet I can agree with most of the contentions made on this floor to-day by those who come from farming districts. The fact is that both producers and consumers are being robbed by conscienceless pirates, and the real task is to free them both from useless and parasitic toll takers. The situation has become intolerable and there must be no further delay in meeting it.

In a majority of American homes to-day the high cost of living is a tragedy. The people are not half as much interested in the league of nations as they are in a league of rations. Where the latest styles in "reservations" in the Senate worries one American, the latest styles of food profiteering worries a thousand. The grocery bill is more important to the people than any bill in Congress, except one which will help to make prices fit pockets.

We speak about cold figures; the figures of the retail price lists of food are flaming hot and gleam red in the eyes of the man to whom they mean privation and suffering both for himself and those dependent on him.

The United States is sailing into one of the biggest storms that every swept a sea. Unless something is done the ship of state will sail straight into that storm with all steam on and all lights out. I say all steam on, if the food monopolizers who have a hunger hold on the American people can not be compelled to let go. All lights out, if blind officials absolutely refuse to comprehend the gravity of the situation.

In one of his debates with Douglas Lincoln said "if we can first know where we are and whither we are tending, we can better judge what to do and how to do it." So it is of vital importance that we know the facts of the present situation and the reasons for it. That does not mean that there is need for everlastingly investigating the high cost of living and spending great sums to inquire whether prices are high. Every man and woman in America knows that prices have been skyrocketed until even the necessaries of life have become luxuries. There have been investigations enough to show the facts, and the people are not asking for light so much as lightning.

We know through reports of the Bureau of Labor Statistics that whereas six years ago a wage earner in Pittsburgh could purchase a year's supply of 22 staple food articles for $354.74, it costs him to-day for those same articles $654.36, or an increase of 88 per cent.

Every other city in the country shows approximately the same increase in the cost of food. That increase has now assumed the proportions of a national calamity.

There have been countless strikes and "labor victories," but the food bill still beats the pay envelope. Wage earners, with all their increases, are still suffering precisely the same as they would if they had suffered a reduction in pay. For them, in the last analysis, the high cost of living is but another name for low wages.

The rate of wages is of secondary importance. The real question is whether or not the pay a man receives will enable him to provide for the needs of himself and family.

If a man gets $100 a month and can buy the things he needs for $90 a month, he can get ahead. But if he gets $150 a month and prices are such that he must spend $160 a month to support his family, he is in an impossible situation.

Enlightened labor leaders see the futility of wage increases, which are followed by still greater increases in the cost of living. William G. Lee, president of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, voiced this conviction most emphatically the other day in his address before the board of railroad wages. He said:

I will admit to you gentlemen that we are going the wrong way. I admit to you that it is time to call a halt, and I admit to you that until we commence together to stop this circle there will be hell in this country, and it is nearer than I ever knew it in my years of experience. Just let somebody drop a match in this country of ours and it will be a sorry day for all of us.

Unless my vision is most terribly obscured, then there is something coming to us pretty soon in this country that we had better take note of. We had something of peace in this country prior to the war conditions. We were getting along fairly well until profiteering became so noticeable everywhere and until the commodities that working people are compelled to pay for were permitted to be increased double and treble without any question and often seemingly with the approval of the Government.

We are nearer war in this world to-day, I believe, than when the Kaiser threw down the gauntlet. Our lawmakers are to blame, in my opinion, because the masses of the people would be behind them if they would attempt to correct it, and surely there is power to correct it; but, instead, they are playing politics, as some of these labor organizations are playing politics, and it is the same all down the line.

Mr. Chairman, the fact is that high wages mean nothing at all if prices keep step with them. If prices go up faster than wages, there is tragedy ahead. Then productive labor brings a decreased reward, and it is true—

That man should labor for his daily bread,
But not that he should toil for naught.

Here, again, the Bureau of Labor Statistics has compiled figures as to the actual relation between wages and the retail prices of food.

Taking 1913 as the basic year, these reports show that by July, 1919, wages had advanced 39 per cent, but retail prices of food showed an increase of 88 per cent.

That means that the man who received a dollar in wages in 1913 only receives 69 cents in real wages to-day. It means that the average wage earner receives less to-day than he received six years ago.

Such a situation is intolerable. Something must be done to break the vicious cycle under which labor compels an increase in wages on Monday only to find that increase taken, and more besides, in the grocer's and butcher's bills of Saturday night.

Mr. Chairman, of all the avenues of mastery of one man over another the command of bread is the most terrible. The dollar in the worker's pay envelope is the evidence of liberty in its most practical form, for it entitles the owner to a certain amount of bread and merchandise and leisure. Any person or any group of persons who deprive the worker of part of the value of that dollar takes from him a part of his liberty.

The facts show that the dollar is only half what it formerly was. The results can be measured in the things of life and liberty. There is a lower standard for the worker—less food, a poorer home, a drearier life. There is elimination of the bright things of life and humiliation and suffering for all the household.

There has followed industrial unrest, strikes, and disorder. There has come the fertilizing of fields for the elements that plot the destruction of American institutions.

But, more than all else, there has come loss of liberty for the children of America, those upon whom the future of Americn rests. They are being robbed of their right to a fair start in life. They are being dwarfed in development at life's threshold, when abundant food is essential to healthy growth.

Significant testimony concerning the relation between the high cost of living and the underfeeding of children is contained in "Standards of Child Welfare—A Report of the Children's Bureau Conferences, May and June, 1919."

Dr. William R. P. Emerson, of Boston, Mass., a distinguished authority, states that about one-third of all the American school children are so badly malnourished that it is impossible for the schools to reach reasonable standards of achievement. Dr. Emerson states that, "as a result, 20 to 40 per cent of those graduating from the elementary schools are physically unfit."

Dr. David Mitchell, of the Bureau of Educational Experiments, New York City, states that of the school children weighed and measured by his bureau during the last week of September, 1918, 30 per cent were 7 per cent or more underweight for their height.

Further evidence of the sinister importance of this situation was adduced by Dr. Thomas D. Wood, chairman, committee of health problems in education, National Council of Education. Dr. Wood states that "three-quarters of the 22,000,000 school children in the United States have health defects which are actually or potentially injurious to them as prospective citizens of the Republic." Dr. Wood says further that "20 per cent at least, or 4,500,000, are suffering from malnutrition."

Dr. Graham Lusk, of Cornell University Medical College, discussing the nutrition of adolescent children, said:

An adequate food supply is the first requisite of national existence. If too little food is available, the first to suffer are the old people, and then the children, although these are often fed with the food designed for the mother, who sacrifices herself for the well-being of her offspring.

Dr. Lusk states that during a long period great numbers of people have been in a state of undernutrition.

So far the evidence has been taken from contributions of medical authorities. Economists show the other side of the picture. Prof. William F. Ogburn, of Columbia University, from studies made for the National War Labor Board and the Bureau of Labor Statistics, arrived at the astonishing conclusion that, while the food actually consumed by a child in a Philadelphia working class family during the first 16 years of life would cost $1,750, a family was actually able to expend only $718 in purchasing the child's food. The difference between those figures, Prof. Ogburn stated, indicates the economies and the adjustments made in the family budget for food. That also suggests the reason for the malnutrition described by the physicians.

Miss Florence Nesbitt, institute director in dietetics, the American Red Cross, states that in cities such as Chicago and Cleveland, where she made investigations, the minimum cost of living for a family of five—father, mother, and three children—requires approximately $1,500 a year. Miss Nesbitt says further:

I asked two managers of Cleveland factories how that compared with the wages of their men. Each one of them said that not more than 25 per cent of their people earned as much as that.

She continued:

We are so in the habit of thinking about the rather abornmal high wages some people have received since the beginning of the war that we jump to the conclusion that the whole body of wage earners are earning a great deal more than they are. When it really comes down to figures, we find that there are large groups who have been affected very little by these raises. In the isolated communities where war industries have not penetrated there are no increases and wages can not begin to cope with the increased cost of living. If we could raise wages to meet the increased cost of living, we would be on solid ground; but there never has been a time when the ordinary wage of untrained labor covered adequate living. In 1914, when the unskilled wage was about $2 a day, it took at least $75 a month to cover the every-day requirements of decent living.

Special investigations in various American cities made by the Children's Bureau indicate the extent to which even babies are underfed because of the advance in prices of food. In Baltimore, for example, of children reported on between 2 years and 7 years of age, only 29 per cent are now—1918—having fresh milk to drink, as against 60 per cent a year ago. Less than 3 per cent of the children studied were having as much as three cups of milk a day, a desirable allowance for the average child. Investigation revealed that a general substitution of tea and coffee in the place of milk was occurring.

In Washington, also, it was found that babies and little children are not having enough milk to drink. More than half of those between 2 and 7 years of age studied by the public-health nurses were receiving no fresh milk to drink at all. The lack of fresh milk in a child's diet, medical experts state, is liable to have serious consequences. Not only is he deprived of the best of all foods for normal growth and development, but often he receives injurious substitutes in its stead. In the Washington families studied it was found that about 29.1 per cent of the babies and children who received no fresh milk to drink were receiving regularly tea and coffee as substitutes for milk. There is grave cause for concern in the fact that, among the children studied, the children between 2 and 7 years who last year were getting less than half the milk they should have are receiving this year—1918—only one-quarter of the desirable allowance, while fully one-third of the babies under 2 are receiving an amount insufficient for proper nourishment.

A study recently made—1918—by the Child Welfare Association of New Orleans, La., under the direction of the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor, revealed that children in New Orleans are getting even less milk to drink than the children of Baltimore and Washington. In Baltimore 66 per cent and in Washington 45 per cent of the children 7 years old and younger in families visited by the nurses who made the study are not receiving any milk to drink. Of the New Orleans children under 8 years of age, 70 per cent are getting no fresh milk to drink, while only 31.7 per cent of those who are receiving some milk are getting as much as the three cups daily required for normal growth and development.

Of the New Orleans children visited it was found that 72.5 per cent of those getting no fresh milk were being given tea and coffee, or both, in its stead. There is ground for anxiety in the fact that 41.7 per cent of the New Orleans families studied are getting no milk at all for their children.

According to Dr. S. Josephine Baker, director of the bureau of child hygiene, department of health, New York, malnutrition has increased among the New York school children from 5 per cent in 1914 to 21 per cent in 1917. During 1917 there were estimated to be over 200,000 undernourished children in New York schools.

The malnutrition of children was, even before 1914, a serious national problem. Poverty and ignorance of dietary essentials have been constant factors in the malnutrition of the young. Post-war conditions, with the increasing advance in the cost of commodities, have accentuated the difficulties of maintaining the health of the children of the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, is this intolerable situation due to the lack of food? Has the Almighty failed to provide subsistence for the sons of men? Is famine the lot of America because our fields and valleys and mountains and seas brought forth no increase?

To ask such questions in the light of the facts is folly. Never in the history of America have the harvests been so bountiful. Mother Nature has provided food for all in abundance, and the skimping which is forced upon the average American is due to man, not to nature.

For instance, last year's wheat crop was 917,100,000 bushels, while the estimate of the Agricultural Department on July 1 for this year's crop is 1,161,000,000 bushels.

Last year's corn crop was 2,582,814,000 bushels, while this year's crop will be above 2,815,000,000 bushels.

It is estimated that this year's net gain over last year in cereals will be 388,000,000 bushels, or an increase of almost four bushels for every man, woman, and child in America.

Last year there were 23,108,000 milch cows in the country, while now there are 23,467,000, or 350,000 more than a year ago.

There are 287,000 more cattle of other kinds than there were a year ago.

There are 1,260,000 more sheep in this country to-day than there were a year ago.

There are 4,609,000 more swine now than there were a year ago.

The official reports show that the production of meat is almost exactly the same per capita that it was 20 years ago, while at the same time prices have jumped 300 per cent and more in that time.

Other lines of food supplies show the same situation. Tremendous increases in production are shown, enough to supply every American with abundance at reasonable prices.

What, then, is the reason that food supplies have passed out of the category of necessities and become luxuries? Why is it that destitution stalks in many places and little children die for lack of food?

It is not because of lack of production. It is because of an infamous and indefensible system of distribution.

There are two phases in the food question. One is the raising of the crop. The other is the transfer from the farm to the pantry.

They are entirely different and require very different faculties. Raising foodstuffs requires skill and training and ability. Carrying food to the pantry of itself requires no particular cleverness.

To raise potatoes requires an enormous amount of trained effort. The ground must be prepared by painstaking application. The seed potatoes must be prepared and placed in the ground. When the plant appears it must be treated against the blight and insect pests. It must be cultivated with hoe or plow to exterminate weeds and secure healthy growth. Then, if weather conditions have been such that the crop matures, the potatoes must be dug, sorted, and packed in bags or barrels.

This is the production, and it is a process which requires great skill and application. To carry those potatoes from the farm to the pantry is in itself a menial service, which, to say the least, should not be regarded as more important than raising the food itself.

But everyone knows that it costs from two to ten times more to deliver foodstuffs to the consumer than it does to produce the food itself.

It takes 2 to 10 men to distribute the food supplies produced by 1 man..

There is the salient fact in the high cost of living. The multiplication of distributors and the consequent high cost in getting products from the producer to the consumer and the interference with free and direct distribution of foodstuffs from producer to consumer are in great part responsible for the high cost of living.

The number of distributors is out of all proportion in many lines to the actual volume of trade. Mr. Harry Tipper, a well-known marketing specialist, is authority for the statement that in 1914 there were 60,000 grocers in this country rated at $1,000 and over, and that there were 35,000 more who were rated at less than $1,000, which means that one-third of the rated retail grocers of the United States were struggling on a margin very narrow.

According to Mr. Tipper's figures there were in the decade of 1870 to 1880, 3.2 per cent of the entire population engaged in distribution, which meant that there was 1 distributor for every 31 people in the United States.

In the decade 1900 to 1910, 6.2 per cent of the entire population was engaged in distribution, or, in other words, there was 1 distributor for every 16 people.

Practically such a state of affairs means that every 16 persons in America supports another person to perform the task of getting supplies necessary for existence.

Of course there are countless parasites hanging on this chain of distribution. Many persons thrive on our present system but never put a helping hand to the task, never perform a single useful service.

For instance, as far back as last January, before the ice had melted from the rivers where salmon run, the salmon pack was bought up by speculators through options on fish that were still to be caught and canned. Sometimes these options change hands five or six times before the ice goes out of the rivers. After the salmon is caught, canned, and stored it frequently changes hands many more times.

The obvious result follows. Each man who comes into this spurious ownership, although in many cases he never physically possesses the fish, takes his profit, and it is in due course loaded on the bending back of the consumer.

This same course is followed in practically all canned goods, tomatoes, pickles, peaches, peas, corn, oysters, and so forth. It furnishes a picture of the most insane distributing system, one where parasites and helpful agent alike are lumped together, all taking toll on the consumer.

Mr. Chairman, look where you will along the line of distribution of foodstuffs and you will find the cost mounting to an intolerable point.

Before the Senate committee investigating the high cost of living, E. A. Calvin, of the Cotton States Advisory Marketing Board, told two weeks ago some personal experiences in buying articles of food.

Potatoes that averaged about $1.50 to the farmer were sold to the consumer at about $4.50.

Onions which brought the producer 5 cents a pound, cost the consumer 20 cents a pound.

Tomatoes were sold by the farmer for less than 5 cents a pound, but were sold to the consumer at 20 to 35 cents a pound.

Cabbage brought 2½ cents to the man who toiled to raise it; to the consumer it cost 12½ cents a pound.

Mr. Calvin stated that a barrel of flour makes 400 loaves of bread, each 12 ounces. Those loaves sold at 9 cents each, making $36 for the barrel. The producer received about $9 for the wheat, but when it reached the consumer, through miller and baker and distributor, it cost $36.

I have a report from a fruit growers' exchange that the same oranges which were sold by the producer for $1.60 a crate brought $4.80 when bought by the consumer. Here it cost $3.20 to deliver a product worth $1.60.

A friend writes that he harvested and cured 150 pounds of boneset, a popular home remedy for colds, which he sold for 3 cents a pound. It was sold at 80 cents a pound, which means that it cost 77 cents to deliver a 3-cent product.

This same friend tells me that his neighbors last summer raised sweet corn under contract with a local canning company for $18 per ton in the husk. The net weight of a ton of corn stripped for canning is 666 pounds. That amount of corn fills 540 No. 2 cans which retail at from 20 to 40 cents each. At this rate the ton of corn cost the consumer $108 to $216. It cost from $90 to $198 to market $18 worth of sweet corn. For each can the farmer's share was 3½ cents, marketing cost 16½ to 36½ cents per can.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that these figures will prove that our present system is most uneconomical, and puts excessive burdens on the man who must bear them all, the ultimate consumer.

What is the remedy? Surely a change in our system of distribution which will clear the channel of communication between producer and consumer would solve part of the difficulty.

There are three powerful weapons in the hands of food traffickers, who control the distribution of food and who thrive and fatten on the suffering of their fellows.

They are the stock exchanges, the storage houses, and the export trade.

On the grain and produce exchanges of this country gamblers are manipulating the necessaries of life in order to extort unholy profits. By a series of chalk marks on a blackboard in gambling dens they levy toll on every dining table in the land.

It is unnecessary to recount these operations, which have been exposed time and again before congressional committees. The fact is that a very few men in Chicago can, through this gambling system, fix prices for both producer and consumer and take profits both ways. A change of a single cent on a bushel of grain changes values more than $50,000,000, so that it can be seen what a weapon this is.

Many of these gamblers buy and sell immense quantities of grain, butter, eggs, and produce without ever handling the articles at all. In one day on the Chicago Grain Exchange more wheat is sold than comes to Chicago in an entire year.

The remedy is to stop all gambling in foodstuffs. These traffickers merit complete extinction. They perform no useful service, but, like the pirates on the high seas, war against all honest business.

I saw on the Thames River below London last summer a place called Execution Dock. It was used in former times as the site for the scaffolds on which pirates were hung. In the old days there was always a line of pirates hung up so that the sailors might see them as they went down the river to the sea.

I would like to see that old custom revived for food gamblers. I have an idea that a few food pirates swinging at the end of a rope would have a wholesome effect on the high cost of living.

Mr. Chairman, the second weapon of those who control distribution of foods in this country is the cold-storage house.

Cold storage is valuable in preserving food, but it has been used by food monopolizers to create an artificial scarcity and thus raise prices. Butter, cheese, eggs, fruit, vegetables, meats, poultry, fish, and other food supplies are stored up in these reservoirs and kept from the people, who are in sore need of them.

Part of this system is the purchase of fruit in the orchards, potatoes in the ground, and so forth. With storage houses full, these products are allowed to rot on the theory that it is better to destroy than to let prices drop. But the consumer pays for every apple or potato that rots.

With this weapon in their hands food monopolizers absolutely nullify the good old law of "supply and demand." It matters not how great the production of food, if great quantities can be stored away or kept out of consumption while just enough is distributed to keep prices at the highest notch.

Take eggs, for example. If we could buy eggs at a reasonable price now, we could dispense with meats until prices come down.

But the food cornerers know that fact also, and they have their greedy hands on both eggs and meat. The consuming public can not escape being gouged, for a meal of eggs is as expensive as a meat diet.

How is this done? Through cold-storage weapon.

On July 15, this year, there were 230,428,890 dozen eggs in the storage houses reporting to the Department of Agriculture. Only July 15, last year, there were 188,771,400 dozen eggs in the same houses.

That means that there were 41,657,490 dozen more eggs at the same time this year than last year, and, of course, this only covers a small part of the actual storage of eggs in this country.

Now, here were larger supplies of eggs than ever before. The prices should be lower, naturally. This is the law of supply and demand. But the price of eggs in July, 1918, was 44 cents a dozen, while in July this year the price was 55 cents a dozen. These bursting storage houses did their work well for the food traffickers.

Then, there is butter. On July 15, 1918, there were 66,202,712 pounds of butter in storage in the houses reporting to the Department of Agriculture. On July 15 this year there were 108,486,022, or an increase of 59 per cent.

The supply of butter had tremendously increased, and the price should have been lower. But butter in July, 1918, sold at 55 cents a pound, while in July this year the price was 65 cents a pound. The law of supply and demand failed to work in face of this cold-storage weapon of food cornerers.

This situation, too, can be remedied. Congress can fix a time limit on cold storage, with regulations as to marking all containers with the price paid for the contents and the date when it was placed in storage. As to the destruction of foods, in storage or out of storage, it should be made a crime, punishable by a long penitentiary term. Any man who holds foods until they spoil or allows food to rot in order to keep it off the market is a criminal and should be treated as such.

Mr. Chairman, the third weapon of those who control food distribution is the export trade.

Never in the history of the world has there been such a transfer of foodstuffs as that shown in the reports of exports for the past six months.

The year ending June 30, 1919, saw exports of $2,500,000,000 in food supplies. That means $125 worth of food for every family in this country. There were food supplies exported during the year greater than our entire export trade in 1914.

But the last few months have been on a scale far larger than the yearly rate. In May of this year $229,197,024 worth of food supplies were sold in Europe. That includes 14,028,479 bushels of wheat; 878,341 bushels of corn; 2,736,273 barrels of flour; 313,016 bushels of potatoes; 5,669,232 pounds of corned beef; 68,957,465 pounds of bacon; 55,807,234 pounds of lard; 759,803 pounds of butter; and 76,387,474 pounds of condensed milk.

In June there were food exports of more than $300,000,000, and weekly reports since indicate that exports have been made at the rate of $4,000,000,000 a year.

While these immense stores of food were being shipped away from America, prices were being increased at home, even though they had already reached a point that meant privation in the average American family.

Such an unwarranted condition must stop. I yield to no one in my desire to see America help the other peoples of the world in every possible way. But I stop when it means starvation for Americans. The Bible command only says "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," not "better than thyself." It does not order any man to supply his neighbor while his own children starve. It does not command any nation to pour out its food supplies on every other nation on earth while its own citizens perish for lack of food at reasonable prices.

The situation becomes more bitter, however, in the fact that there is no brotherly love whatever in the shipment of these food stores abroad, but only a cold-blooded desire to get supplies out of the country so that the prices of the stocks that remain may be fixed at the highest point.

Mr. Chairman, the remedy for this evil is simple, and consists in a limitation of exports in foodstuffs until prices reach a reasonable level at home. The use of this weapon against the common good can be prevented easily, and action should be taken at once to curb this evil. Such action simply means that we propose to "feed America first."

These three things can be done at once: Prevent gambling in foodstuffs by prohibiting all fictitious sales. Open up the storage houses and allow the food held off the market to be distributed and at the same time provide that those who deliberately destroy food in or out of storage shall go behind prison bars. Limit exports of food until prices at home have reached a reasonable level.

Such action as this will have a splendid effect in clearing the channel of communication between producer and consumer. It will destroy many of the parasites who thrive on the necessities of the people.

But there must be still more fundamental action if permanent improvement in the task of getting products from the farm to the pantry with the least possible expense is to be carried out.

There is too much waste in distribution, even under the best conditions. In the olden days the buyer and seller came face to face in the market place and there dealt directly without toll taken between.

But the cities widened out, and now the producers live far away. Only a few of them bring their products to the city market and sell direct to the customers, and the time spent in selling the goods is an added cost to the products.

We must eliminate the distance which separates the producer in the country and the consumer in the city.

We need a scientific marketing system which will carry the product in a straight line from the farm to the pantry, from the producer to the consumer.

We must systematize and coordinate the job of carrying things which, as we saw in the case of the potatoes, is not in itself so great a task as the raising of foodstuffs.

Now, for the task of carrying things the Federal Government has an organization which is the greatest of its kind in the world. It is called the post-office service, and the charges are relatively inexpensive and can be made still lower and yet pay all expenses of operation.

Mr. Chairman, there is no essential difference between the delivery of a book by mail and a pound of butter or a bushel of potatoes. Already tons of foodstuffs are being carried direct from the farm to the pantry, even under all the handicaps which apply at present.

But I hear some Members of Congress declaring that the attempt to perform this service has failed to receive public support. I noted in a recent issue of the Washington Star a statement purporting to come from a Government official who voiced such an opinion. He is quoted as saying if the people wanted reforms in the distributing system and the transportation system they would have them. The men whose business it is to distribute and to transport foodstuffs would have seen to it that they did. The Government already has provided the parcel post, and the Post Office Department and the Bureau of Markets have cooperated to aid the people in purchasing direct from the farmers by this means. Experiments have been made in city marketing and in motor transportation from farm to consumer. But in spite of all this work, the people continue to purchase their foodstuffs as they desire from the nearest store, over the telephone, on credit, for delivery, and in other ways that add greatly to the cost.

There is an old saying that one man can lead a horse to water, but 10 men can not make him drink. The Government has shown the way and has provided facilities to aid the people in purchasing cheaply. They must go the rest of the way themselves.

Now, that statement is entirely unfair. The people have shown a wonderful eagerness to use the facilities of the Government in direct dealing by the parcel-post system of the Post Office Department, as is shown by the transportation of 2,300,000,000 parcels in the year ended June 30, 1919. A very large proportion of this stupendous number of packages was made up of food products.

But in almost every instance it was necessary for a city dweller to get into direct communication with the producer in the country and carry out a seperate business transaction for every package delivered.

Such a handicap means much to both producer and consumer. It means that the farmer must carry a multitude of small accounts with people whom he does not know personally. He must pack a large number of small cartons and see that they are mailed. He must get in touch with a sufficient number of persons to take his production. He must take the chance of bad bills, with consequent loss of profits.

The consumer is in as difficult a position. If he desires eggs, for instance, he must locate a farmer who will ship him eggs in parcel-post lots. He must purchase a container for frequent shipping which costs about $1. He must pay postage charges, which for a single dozen will cost him 10 cents. He must send letters in ordering and instructing and in paying his accounts.

Aside from the simple fact that the average city dweller does not personally know a farmer from whom he can buy and that the average farmer does not know the townsmen to whom he can sell, the expensive nature of this individual business is enough to prevent the use of the parcel-post system.

Mr. Chairman, what is the answer to that situation? It is to be found in wholesale shipments from producers to consumers. If one farmer or a number of farmers can sell their entire production and ship in bulk to the purchasers, we have done away with this tremendous obstacle.

Mr. Chairman, that brings us back to the suggestion of cooperative buying and selling.

At the hearings before the Senate committee on the high cost of living during the past few weeks every speaker has stressed the value of cooperative marketing. It is astonishing to see how all these experts on widely different lines come back at last to this one suggestion.

Mr. Calvin declared that his solution would be the publication of prices received by the producer and cooperative marketing.

Mr. Edward J. Ward, special community organizer of the bureau of education, pointed out that—the most extraordinary and most successful handling of supplies in America is found in public cooperation in Alaska.

Dr. W. E. Mosher, director of the joint commission of the reclassification of salaries, said:

There has been no time like the present to acquaint the American people with the possibilities of the cooperative idea as applied to the purchase and distribution of common commodities. The cost of living has been greatly reduced in certain European countries because they have developed the ability to buy together and to sell together on a cooperative basis. We Americans, traditionally and naturally individualistic, have seen cooperative schemes come and go; we have not been schooled by a military system nor by want and privation to sacrifice our individualistic tendencies to such social processes as have developed, particularly in England and Germany. Cooperative associations are doing millions and millions of dollars' worth of business every year in these foreign countries. Goods are marketed at regular prices, the people profiting from the dividends that are declared from time to time on the stock which they have subscribed to the cooperative enterprise.

It appears to me that this committee might very well take the opportunity that it has of making specific recommendations concerning cooperative purchasing, marketing, and distributing on the part of the people of the city. It is to be hoped that the committee will make so worthy a report that it will command a widespread reading, so that the cooperative movement may be called to the attention of the American people as one of the chief means of reducing the high cost of living.

Mr. Royal Meeker, Commissioner of Labor Statistics, Department of Labor, said:

I have great hopes of the cooperative movement. I do not know whether the American people can be brought to realize the importance of doing things cooperatively instead of depending altogether upon private enterprise and private initiative or so-called enterprises. I do not know whether they can be made to see that or not, but I think it is well worth trying out—establishing great cooperative enterprises for the purpose of bringing the producer and the consumer together. That will mean legislation in order to prevent the private profiteer from getting in his work and taking all the economy that is effected by your more perfect distribution system.

Mr. Walter Y. Durand, special examiner, Federal Trade Commission, declared that—very great reduction in the cost of living can be found through a reorganization of our marketing system in order to do away with unnecessary costs.

Dr. Carson Ryan, president of Local No. 2, Federal Employees' Union, urged strongly that Congress should assist by legislation the system of cooperation. He told of the difficulties experienced by the cooperative store in the Bureau of Standards which had to go to Delaware and pay $300 to be incorporated to do cooperative business. He said:

There are constructive things that can be done and no Member of the House or Senate should object to it. They are simply constructive measures to make possible cooperative buying.

Mr. E. M. Dawson, president of Local 89, Federal Employees' Union, said:

Were we not so individualistic here, we might perhaps be willing to get together and save money. I almost wish, from time to time, that prices would go so high that some sense would be pounded into our heads about cooperation. Why not have hundreds of motor trucks laden with goods move from the farming districts every day to the Nation's Capital and let Government employees and others get the benefit?

Mr. Charles A. Lynam, secretary of the National Board of Farm Organizations, said:

There are remedies for this situation. The farmers have got all they can do to handle their own case. They know that they must organize. We have these great farm organizations, some of which are educational in nature, like the grange and the farmers' union and the equity societies and the gleaners; and then there are other organizations that have come into line as a result of the education of these organizations, and they are organized around the marketing of some particular crop, such as oranges in California and milk around the cities, and live stock, and so on. They have got all they can do to take care of their own affairs and this propaganda has put them in an unfavorable light. But they are anxious to see the consumers properly and effectively organized.

There have been all kinds of attempts to start cooperative stores. That is not what we need so much as a movement starting from groups such as are represented here, that in a national way will point out the benefit of cooperative buying.

Hugh S. Jeffries, representing a large organization of soldiers, sailors, and marines, said:

Our experience with Government ownership has not been such as to make us highly enthusiastic about it, but I think that the soldiers have about come to the conclusion that if we must have a monopoly we would rather have it a Government monopoly than a privately owned monopoly. But between the two extremes of a Government owned monopoly and a privately owned monopoly there is an opportunity for cooperation; and unless cooperative effort is fostered and aided in every way by public institutions and through legislation those efforts will be at the mercy of the great organized forces whose interests are adversely affected by the success of the cooperative means of distribution of bringing the producer and the consumer close together.

Mr. Chairman, surely in this unvarying testimony as to the value of cooperation in the handling of food supplies we may find a pressing need for action.

But what plan shall we follow in organizing a cooperative marketing system?

Some enthusiasts point to the Rochdale system in England as the ideal plan for America.

Capt. Conner, retired, British Army, appeared before the Senate committee and painted a glowing picture of the possibility of such a system in this country. He stated that the Plymouth Society, of which he is a member, started in 1860 with 12 members and $15 and is now a society of 56,000 members with assets of $4,000,000.

This society and all others like it sell at current market prices and then declare dividends out of the savings, which this officer stated was about 12½ per cent.

Now, admitting that this cooperative plan has been splendidly successful in England, it does not follow that it would be successful here.

It is based on the theory that the Government is something above the people, and that Parliament is an enemy to be circumvented by outside efforts and agencies.

The American theory is that the people are the Government. They have organized certain agencies to perform their work. They desire to make use of their own agencies, not for a group of citizens but for all the citizens of the Republic.

The British plan benefits only those who are members and who pay the assessments. The American idea is that the very fact of citizenship carries with it the right to participate in common benefits.

The group idea is British, perhaps, and it seems to have filled every need in England. But the public idea is American, and special benefits to certain groups will not suffice in America.

How, then, shall we adapt this cooperative plan to America?

By community organizations instead of group organizations. There must be such union of the consumers that every resident of the community has a share in the benefits derived. There must be no assessments but common benefits based on American citizenship.

The community unit in America is the public-school district. In every community in the Nation, situated conveniently for all, is a public-school building. It is the logical center of any community organization.

My plan for cooperation, then, is to organize every city district into a community organization in the schoolhouse. The election of a community secretary by the people puts the responsibility into the hands of one individual, an essential to any plan of cooperation. What is everybody's business is nobody's business, and therefore there must be one person charged with the duty of acting as the agent of the people and subject to the people's directions.

With such an organization in the city it can be easily seen that orders for eggs, butter, vegetables, and other food products may be grouped into bulk orders. No longer does the individual have to find the farmer and make a separate deal with him.

All the families in the community may order through the community secretary and he can order cases of eggs instead of dozens.

The same thing applies in rural sections. The farmers organize in their logical community headquarters, the central public-school houses of the townships. They elect a community secretary who is charged with the responsibility of acting as agent for the people. He keeps records of each man's shipments and he deals direct with the elected representative of the people in the city districts.

Thus one representative deals with one representative. Gone is the multitude of individual transactions and instead is a system of wholesale dealing, the lack of which has prevented full success of the plan to secure direct communication between buyer and seller.

Then between these two cooperative societies runs the Postal Service. By motor truck, train, and other conveyance it carries the products at postal rates and nothing more.

The connection is made directly when the community secretary is made a postal agent, receiving exactly the same pay on the same basis as all other postal agents. Then we have linked up the local community and the National Government. We have brought about the thing which every great American has hoped for—joined the local community with the Federal Government.

In connection with the schoolhouse would be a building for the receiving of food supplies—a warehouse in the country district and a market house in the city district.

From the farm center would proceed the motor trucks of the Postal Service, carrying the food products directly to the market house of the city community. These foods would be packed in standard packages and graded according to standards of the Department of Agriculture.

At the community market house the community secretary postal agent would distribute the products direct to the consumers. He would be in daily touch with the producers in his territory and would know what kinds of foods were available and in what quantity. The postmaster in each city would receive reports from each postal agent in the city and a post-office official in each rural county would receive reports from all organizations in his county.

Thus a clearing house would be established for all foods, surplus as well as deficiencies. With direct communication between county agents and Washington, surplus foods could be mobilized wherever needed in quick and efficient manner.

Mr. Chairman, the essentials of this plan are not theory, but fact. Between the Park View School, in Washington, and the Mount Joy School, in Adams County, Pa., runs a postal motor truck every day, carrying farm products directly to the consumers.

Both communities are organized, all the people in each being members not through the payment of assessments but by virtue of their American citizenship.

In Park View the people elected the school principal as community secretary, and in Mount Joy the people elected the schoolteacher as community secretary. The Post Office Department made each of them a postal agent.

The farmers in Mount Joy Township have their produce classified and recorded by their agent, who is at the same time the agent of the National Government. The postal motor truck carries the daily shipments direct to the Park View schoolhouse in the city, where it is received and distributed by the agent of the people there.

Settlement is made by money order each week, and in eight months' operation there have been no difficulties on that score, although large quantities of food have been handled through this system. The farmers get more than they could through any other method of marketing, and the consumer gets his food at much lower prices. The only expense is the actual cost of carriage of the products.

Mr. Chairman, extend that service over the entire country and the cost of living would take a permanent drop. The problem of the economical distribution of foodstuffs would be solved. It would not involve price fixing, which never has succeeded in such matters and never will succeed. It will allow the law of supply and demand to operate, supplemented by an adequate system of transportation and distribution, and unhindered by selfishness and greed for gain on the part of parasites of business. It would remove present interferences and obstructions in the channel of distribution, which are the leading cause of the high cost of living.

Much of the equipment is at hand. It will take thousands of motor trucks on the highways of America. At this moment around 10,000 motor trucks are lying idle and useless at Camp Holabird, near Baltimore, rusting and rotting to destruction. There are many more thousands elsewhere. These trucks should be on the roads carrying food from the farm to the pantry. At parcel post rates the trucks could be paid for out of the profits of the service, even if we had not already passed a law providing for the turning over of these trucks to the Post Office Department without charge.

Sometimes when things have grown so old that they are almost forgotten they become new again and are adopted to meet modern needs. Transportation over the highways comes to us out of the misty past. Rome could never have attained her greatness without her highways. Her great military roads brought remote places within easy reach of the Eternal City and made the saying "All roads lead to Rome" a true one.

After years of neglect of our roads in America we are coming to realize that the highways and motor vehicles offer the proper solution for many of our problems of distribution.

Secretary Eggleston, of the highways transport committee of the Iowa State Council of Defense, reported that the trucks in Iowa alone for the year 1918 traveled 12,880,420 miles on the highways, hauling a tonnage of 488,400 tons, at a saving of $2,318,475.60 over the cost of horse-drawn vehicles. This included trucks only, and did not count the 365,000 automobiles owned by Iowa people.

Now, when you figure that there are 2,200,000 miles of highways in this country, seven times the mileage of all our railroads, canals, rivers, lakes, and coastal waterways, you begin to see the stupendous possibilities of full utilization of the highways by motor trucks and other conveyances.

Of course, the returns in mail transportation on these highways is immensely higher than under any other form of transportation. A ton of first-class mail matter brings in postal revenues of $2,000. That means that by carrying 15 pounds of first-class matter the entire expense of operating a 2-ton truck over 100 miles of highway can be met.

Food commodities carried at half the present rates will easily net a profit in the operation of these postal trucks on the roads of America.

For instance, a cannery recently offered to sell in one lot 1,200 cases of tomatoes, or 14,400 cans, at 15 cents a can, and pay the cost of delivery. If the people of one or several communities had been organized in the manner outlined they could easily have taken advantage of this saving.

The delivery task was simply to carry 48,000 pounds from the cannery to the community headquarters. It would require 12 two-ton trucks to move this entire order in a single day. On each case, weighing about 40 pounds, there would be paid 45 cents postage, making postal receipts of $490 for the entire shipment.

The entire expense of operating the 12 trucks over a route of 100 miles would be $316. That includes carrying the load one way and returning empty the other.

In other words, the Postal Service would make a clear profit of $173 in carrying these goods; the consumers would save $1,440 on this single order of tomatoes; the producer would dispose of his pack in a single order, without expense save charges for delivery.

Experimental motor-truck routes in the Postal Service have proved the efficiency of this system, not on sporadic instances, but on the test of many months.

Fourth Assistant Postmaster General Blakslee in a report of these routes cited the figures of that one known as the Washington-Rock Point-Scotland route.

For November, 1916, the amount of matter carried totaled 20,600 pounds. In November, 1917, the amount jumped to 49,649 pounds. In November, 1918, it reached a total of 73,318 pounds. In April, 1919, the total was 126,326 pounds.

The total gross earnings for 1918 were $96,561.70. Deducting one-third of this entire amount for war tax, which applied on first-class matter alone, leaves $70,409.92. Deducting 50 per cent of the balance to more than cover all other postal operations, there is still left receipts of $35,204.71.

The entire cost of operating this route for a year, with all direct and indirect charges included, was $14,382.27, which means that the net earnings on this one route for one year were $20,822.44.

Mr. Chairman, this House recently adopted my proposal to direct the Secretary of War to utilize the Parcel Post Service in the distribution of the surplus Army food supplies. The plan was put into operation on Monday of this week, and in spite of the tremendous size of the task, the Postal Service, thanks to First Assistant Koons and Fourth Assistant Blakslee, handled it with notable success. These two men refused to be daunted by the difficulties, and backed by most of the postmasters and postal employees of the country, they showed that the Postal Service, at least, could meet an extraordinary task in efficient fashion.

I learned to-day that a few post offices have reported by telegram as to the business done in the first four days of this sale of Army foodstuffs direct to the people. San Francisco reports 2,058 orders with cash receipts of $24,004. New Orleans reports 1,590 orders and cash receipts of $25,266.69. Boston reports 2,400 orders and $36,000. Omaha, 1,235 orders and $14,936. St. Louis reports 3,561 orders and $56,256.52. Philadelphia, 8,016 orders and $100,570.

There have been failures at some points, due to inefficiency and a disinclination to cooperate, but I submit that these reports show the tremendous possibilities of this system of distribution of foodstuffs.

Here is the common-sense method of bringing the producer and consumer together in the solution of the bread and butter question of America. It is the only nation-wide system of distribution in existence. It belongs to all the people. I have heard protests against the complete use of the Postal Service from men who seem to base their opposition on the ground that this great service is the private property of the Postmaster General. They are simply allowing their feeling against an individual, however well founded it may be, to prevent them from helping in a great constructive effort to use the American-owned distributing system in the task of lowering the high cost of living.

Think of the situation. There are 60,000 star and rural route carriers in our Postal Service, traversing every day the food-producing sections of the country. Every one of them should be transporting a ton of foodstuffs each day. That would mean 120,000,000 pounds of food carried every day, and counting that the average individual consumes two pounds a day, would supply 60,000,000 people, more than the entire city population of America.

Why do they not do it? I have pointed out the difficulties of individual bargaining and they can be solved by cooperation. Other things stand in the way, such as the roads, the vehicles, and the rates. Each of them can be remedied. The roads can and in fact are being improved. The motor vehicle supplies the ideal carrier for this purpose. The rates, which are now $20 a ton for the first zone and $10 a ton for even local communities, can be greatly reduced and still be profitable.

Right now the Government is losing $70,000,000 a year on these rural and star routes, because they are not used to their full capacity. I would make them profitable agencies by making them a factor in the distribution of foodstuffs and return to the people many times the present loss in the reduction of the Nation's food bill.

Mr. Chairman, the fabled Sphinx propounded its riddle. Find the answer or be crushed. So on the path of time America has come to the present challenge. Answer this problem of making prices fit pockets or be destroyed.

We dare not refuse to act promptly and effectively. To neglect the infamous triumphs of those who prey on the people's needs means to shake the pillars of this Republic to their wreck. Let America perpetuate this hideous exploitation of her workers while parasites and drones flourish on the manipulation of a nation's bread, and we will face a more dangerous foe than the Imperial German Government.

I consider that the public official who stakes the welfare of the people in such a crisis on an outworn theory of government is as heartless as that Sultan who looked upon a painting of the head of John the Baptist and declared that it was incorrectly portrayed. "A man's head does not look like that when it is cut off," he declared to the painter. The artist took issue with him, and to prove his contention the Sultan, with one sweep of his scimiter, struck off the head of a faithful servant who stood at his side.

Here is a condition where hunger stalks abroad in a country where there are bumper crops, storehouses full to bursting, and ships carrying food from America to the Seven Seas.

Mr. Chairman, we must act at once. We must throw open these storehouses and prevent their use as artificial reservoirs to restrict distribution of foods and to increase prices. We must limit exports of foodstuffs until Americans have the necessaries of life at fair prices. And, finally, to secure permanent benefit, we must clear the channels of distribution of all parasites and useless toll takers and permit the producer of the food to deal directly with the man who consumes it.

Then we may see that bread and liberty are but different names for the same thing, and we may make sure that both are the possessions of American citizens.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY]. I trust that the amendment will not be adopted. The section of the bill he proposes to amend provides for the punishment to be imposed upon those who are convicted of violation of the law. We have started out, and should continue as nearly as possible, to comply with the request of the Attorney General. The portion of the section providing for punishment of offenders was prepared by him and, in my opinion, should remain as it is. And it would, I believe, be unwise to make the punishment more severe. Crime is not best prevented by severe punishment. It is the certainty of conviction that yields best results in the prevention of crime. If a law provides a very severe penalty a prosecuting officer finds it difficult to secure conviction, and in this case, if we add to the penalty, we may embarrass the Attorney General in his effort to enforce the law.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I have not the time to yield. There is no way of getting an extension of time.

It may not be out of place for me to refer to and to some extent repeat remarks I made in the House last Thursday, the 14th instant, on the food-control act of August 10, 1917, the act to which this bill is offered as an amendment. At that time I used all the time permitted to me, but the time was too short to enable me to deal fully with the subject, because other matters were then pressing for attention. The food-control act, as you know and as the country ought to know, has been in force more than two years, but there is evidently lack of knowledge on the part of the House and by the country as to its important and far-reaching provisions. I wish again to call attention to some of those provisions, to tell you what they permit and authorize the administration to do with respect to the control of food, feeds, fuel, and so forth, and something of the work done under that law.

Everyone appreciates the seriousness of the food problem; that it is very serious, and for many months has been getting worse. Prices are high and going higher, and there is very insistent and entirely proper demand by the country that these unfortunate conditions shall be corrected by prompt and effective enforcement of laws now on the books, and by further legislation, if necessary, as far as laws and their execution will be helpful. It has been pointed out to us by the President in his message that the provisions of the food-control act as it now stands are not sufficient, and that additional legislation is necessary.

There is positively no disposition in Congress to withhold legislation or refuse to place in the hands of the administration any weapons that legislation can give to enable it in an effective way to carry on a campaign against high prices and evil practices that are exacted or indulged in by some business men, large and small, throughout the country. The Committee on Agriculture, to which the recommendations of the President were referred, after full consideration and unanimous action, has reported a bill designed to meet these recommendations in every respect.

And right here, I wish to speak briefly of the bill now before the House, and also of the law as it now stands, the law passed in August, 1917. The law now on the book includes everything now demanded by the President, except that he wishes to add clothing and containers in which food, feeds, fuel, and other things described as necessaries in the act are sold; and right here, I may say that the committee has gone even further than the President suggests, inasmuch as the amendment the committee presents contains the words "wearing apparel," instead of clothing, thus making the matter much broader than was suggested.

Under the food-control act the President organized the Food Administration and the Fuel Administration, and those organizations were, under the law, authorized to do everything—except as to clothing and containers—that any officer or any body of men acting under the authority of the administration will be able to do after these amendments are adopted. It is true that section 5, which authorizes absolute control of business relating to food, fuel, and other necessaries, contains a proviso which exempts retail dealers, and a retailer is described as one who is not engaged in wholesale trade and whose gross sales do not exceed $100,000 per annum. But the licensing provisions of the section are so broad and comprehensive that the Food Administration and the Fuel Administration were able to, and as far as they wished did, reach retailers by having the licenses issued to large dealers contain a provision to the effect that they, the wholesale dealers, should not sell to or do business with retailers who made an unjust or unreasonable rate, charge, commission, or price for their goods, or who were guilty of any unfair or improper practice or method of business. This form of license was authorized under section 5, and its use was effective, or could be made effective, to influence and control the retail trade in necessaries.

The operations of the Food Administration and the Fuel Administration under the licensing system covered the entire country and should have been continued. The fact is, however, that a very large part of the licensing operation was stopped and its further operation forbidden by proclamation issued by the President, while he was in France, February 11, 1919. This proclamation canceled all licenses and forbade their further application to all engaged in the business of importing, manufacturing, storing, or distributing butter or eggs, or engaged in the business of operating cold-storage warehouses. Thus the strong hand of the Government was removed from any and all kinds of business in butter, eggs, meats of all kinds, fish, cheese, and lard. It seems to me it is only necessary for us to know the broad provisions of the law and the effectiveness with which it operated to enable us to determine whether or not the action of the President in giving up control and suspending operation respecting all these necessaries was wise or otherwise. And if I may be permitted to express an opinion, I should say that if licenses had been permitted to continue in force and if the agencies of the Government created for the purpose had been permitted to carry on their work under the license section, the business in food and other necessaries throughout the country might have been under reasonable if not perfect control, and that the present deplorable condition of extortion by high prices and unfair practices of the trade might have been prevented.

The licensing system having been laid aside and abandoned, it is demanded that the law shall be so amended as to permit of control of necessaries by arresting and prosecuting offending dealers, and it will be noticed that the only method available or to be used in attempting to effect this control is by way of arrest and prosecution. All other methods, some of them found very effective, have been abandoned, and the Attorney General, speaking for the administration, says they will not again be resorted to. It is sincerely to be hoped that the method to be pursued will be effective, because conditions are intolerable and the people of the country are entitled to relief if it can possibly be given.

I have no objection to the arrest of business men who are guilty of profiteering; in fact, I feel, as every one must feel, that some of them have offended most seriously and are deserving of severe punishment; nor do I overlook or minimize the effect and influence that arrests and prosecutions will have on offending dealers; but everyone must know that all arrests and prosecutions that can possibly be made will be very, very small in proportion to the total number of dealers that ought to be reached, and I regret exceedingly that it has been determined to lay aside all sections and features of the food-control act, except the section providing for arrests and prosecutions. I should permit these arrests to be made and permit vigorous prosecutions to follow, but in view of the seriousness of the problem and the immense extent of country over which the trouble exists, the administration ought not to refuse to adopt or make reasonable effort to put into effect some of the regulatory, corrective, or preventive measures so clearly set out in the food-control act as it now stands, many of which means and methods have heretofore been employed and have been found effective.

It has been urged by the Attorney General and by others who approve his demands that any method of regulation could be used only after a wide and complete price-fixing plan had been worked out, and they say that any kind of price fixing is obnoxious. We all agree that price fixing as attempted by some of the agencies of this administration during the war were obnoxious, and it may be added that much of their work was a failure; but unless arrests and prosecutions are to be made and carried on in a reckless and haphazard way, there must be some investigation and some determination as to prices, and I submit that any investigation as to prices that will justify arrest and prosecution will give all information necessary for the exercise of regulatory, corrective, and preventive measures.

I did not suggest to the Attorney General, nor has it been suggested by anyone, that he should be limited or restricted in any respect whatever in carrying on his campaign against the profiteers by means of arrests and prosecutions, but it has been suggested that a separate and additional means and method—that is, by regulatory and preventive measures—should be given to him, and it has been urged that, without interfering with arrests and prosecutions, a very large part of the existing trouble can be reached without harsh methods; that the vast majority of dealers are willing to comply with orders and regulations; and that while arrests may be necessary in some cases, perhaps in a large number a regulatory program ,authorized and outlined in existing law, might very well be put into operation.

After all has been said, it may possibly be that the proposed plan of issuing warrants and of taking offenders right into court may be the only effective remedy, and if it shall prove to be so I shall applaud and be willing to give full credit to those who carry it on, and I have heartily favored an amendment to the law that will permit them to do it; but I feel that a brass-band proceeding, with all the noise and publicity that goes with it, should not be the only plan of dealing with this serious and widespread trouble.

I have said that every request made by the administration has been promptly and cheerfully complied with by the Committee on Agriculture, which now presents its bill to the House, but I wish to say that the committee, by unanimous action, has recommended another amendment, one not asked for and not approved by the administration. It is an amendment that exempts from arrest and prosecution under section 4 of the act farmers, gardeners, and other producers of farm products respecting the business of handling and selling the products of their own farms, and that permits cooperative associations of farmers to carry on collective bargaining respecting farm operations and farm products of farmers composing the association. This amendment, as I have said, was not requested by officials of the administration who appeared before the committee, and it may be opposed by them, but it is offered after full consideration by the committee in the firm belief that it is proper and necessary and entirely fair and just to the farmers of the country.

Many newspapers tell us, and we hear it also from a few Members of Congress, that farmers are guilty of profiteering, and in support of the charge they point to high prices of farm products paid by consumers. The fact is, however, established by even a cursory examination of the situation that prices received by farmers for their products are a very small part of the prices paid by consumers. It is true that prices obtained by farmers for their products are higher than they were before the war, but the cost of production is very much higher. The prices farmers pay for labor on the farm and prices for machinery, tools, fertilizers, in fact everything they have to buy, are higher than ever before, and the increase in prices of these things has been much higher in proportion than are any of the prices actually received by farmers for their products.

In August, 1917, when the Committee on Agriculture was considering the food-control bill, it was realized that some of its provisions would permit the officers of the administration, or of agencies created by it, to control or influence the prices farmers were to receive for their products, and that if this control and influence were to be exercised, something should be done and some provision of law should be enacted that would enable the same officers or the same agencies to control prices of machinery, tools, equipment, fertilizers, and so forth, that farmers must buy, and in order to carry out this idea and to give proper protection to farmers, the first section of the food-control act provides that "fertilizers and fertilizer ingredients, tools, utensils, implements, machinery, and equipment required for the production of foods, feed, and fuel" shall be deemed "necessaries," and the act as a whole expressly provides and contains ample authority for the control of these things and for influencing the prices that farmers must pay for them.

And now, when the farmers are called profiteers and objection is made to any exception whatever in their behalf, it is interesting to know that, with the single exception of nitrate fertilizer, there has been absolutely no effort on the part of the administration, or of any of its officers or agencies, to control or influence in any manner the prices farmers must pay for any of the above-mentioned articles; and nitrate fertilizer was bought by the Secretary of Agriculture and sold exclusively, I believe, to cotton planters of the South.

Now, in view of what I have said, known to be true even by the casual observer, it is clear that the farmers of the country are not open to the charge of profiteering, and it is clear also, as we look again at the provisions of the food-control act and as we recall that absolutely nothing has been done to protect farmers against high prices, that the amendment by which they will be secure against prosecution and arrest while carrying on their business of selling their own products and while associations composed entirely of farmers are attempting to assist them in carrying on their business, ought to be adopted and that they ought not to be subject to the drastic and penal provisions of the law.

On other occasions, in debate in this House and while speaking in other places, I have said, substantially as I say now, that farmers and farm business have not been protected, certainly have not been favored as a class, by any law the Congress has passed since the war began, but occasionally the correctness of my statements has been questioned, and the act by which Congress fixed the guaranteed price of wheat was referred to. It is evidently the belief of some of the people of the country that the Congress conferred a great favor on the farmers and offered them substantial protection by enacting a law by which they were guaranteed a minimum price of $2 a bushel for their wheat. This opinion is not held by anyone who knows the facts as they existed at the time the guaranty was fixed, or as they have existed from that time to the present.

When our country entered the European war the President of the United States issued an appeal to the farmers of the country, urging them to increase the production of wheat and other food products, and this appeal was echoed and repeated by patriotic societies all over the land. The need of a large supply of food was well known and very acute, because it was necessary for us not only to supply our own people but to furnish to the warring people of Europe with whom we were associated a large part of the food they must have to enable them to live and to carry on the war. In order to insure to farmers that a largely increased production of wheat would not result in a low price for that product, it was suggested that the Congress enact a law providing that the Government itself should guarantee to all farmers that they would receive not less than $2 a bushel for all the wheat they might raise. It was never suggested that a law should be passed, or that anything by way of administrative action should be done, to prevent or interfere with farmers in obtaining a higher price than $2 a bushel; that if war conditions creating a large demand for wheat should force the price in this country and in the markets of the world above $2 per bushel, it was thought that farmers would have the advantage of the increased prices; in other words, it was never suggested that the minimum price of $2 should be the maximum price also. The farmers of the country were to be permitted to have and enjoy a high price if conditions should bring about a higher price. At the very time the matter of fixing a $2 minimum price was under consideration the price of wheat on the Chicago Board of Trade was $3.45 a bushel, and at the same time Mr. Herbert C. Hoover, who later was made Food Administrator, said that if the price of wheat were not controlled by some action of our Government it might reach as high as $7 per bushel. In view of this condition and in view of this statement, no one thought—certainly had no right to think—that the fixing of a minmum price of $2 a bushel on wheat was a concession or a favor to the farmers of the country.

I may say that one thing that influenced Members of Congress interested in the welfare of the farmers to demand a law guaranteeing a minimum price for wheat was that Mr. Hoover, deeply interested as he evidently was in European food conditions, made numerous statements as to what he could do with the prices of wheat in this country if he were authorized by law to interfere with or control the wheat situation. One of the things he said was that he could easily put the price of wheat down to a dollar and a half a bushel, and that if necessary he could put it down to 75 cents a bushel. The Congress, after learning of these statements, determined that there should be a guaranteed minimum price, and determined that that price should not be less than $2 per bushel. As I have said, there was no intention of making this $2 per bushel a maximum price, it being the intention and prevailing idea that the market prices which might and evidently would be much higher than $2 a bushel would be permitted to prevail. The fact is, however, that the Food Administration under Mr. Hoover and the Grain Corporation under Mr. Julius H. Barnes so administered the food-control act and so controlled the market for wheat—the milling of it and the selling of wheat and flour—that the minimum price of $2.20 a bushel as fixed by the administration became not only the minimum price but the maximum price as well. The regulations of these organizations were so enforced that millers and other large buyers of wheat were subjected to large fines if they paid more than $2.20 a bushel, and millers in addition to fines imposed upon them were threatened with having their licenses revoked and their businesses closed altogether. It was with these things in mind, particularly the high-handed and unjustifiable action of Mr. Hoover and Mr. Barnes, that Congress tried to increase the guaranteed price of wheat. On two occasions when this matter was before the House I offered amendments; first, to make the minimum price $2.50 per bushel. That amendment, as you will remember, failed.

A little later, when the Agricultural bill was again before the House, I offered an amendment fixing the guaranteed price of wheat at $2.40 a bushel, and that amendment was adopted by the House and approved by the Senate. You remember the result: The President vetoed the bill and the guaranteed price remained as fixed by him at $2.20 per bushel, and the Food Administration and the Grain Corporation continued, as before, to make that price the highest price that farmers were permitted to obtain.

After the signing of the armistice, the wheat situation in this country seemed to change. An unusually large yield of wheat was promised, and it seemed likely that the Government, having fixed a guaranteed price of $2.26 per bushel, might suffer very serious loss. In order to meet this situation and to enable the Government to make good its guaranty to the farmers of the country, an act was passed directing the Government to carry out its guaranty, and to enable it to make good any loss it might sustain, an appropriation of $1,000,000,000 was made. But predictions as to an immense yield of wheat and forecasts as to market conditions and prices were not realized, and the result was that, the Grain Corporation having ceased to some extent to control prices, the price of wheat was and continued to be much higher than the guaranteed price of $2.26 as fixed by the President. And this higher price might prevail now but for the fact that Mr. Barnes, of the Grain Corporation, got busy and has been busy, and, as he did last year, has made the minimum price the maximum price.

If the facts I have cited and the bits of history I have recalled to your mind show anything, they show very clearly that the fixing of a guaranteed minimum price on wheat and the course pursued by Mr. Hoover and Mr. Barnes have not benefited wheat-growing farmers. And while I assume no authority to speak for farmers as distinguished from people engaged in other lines of business, I am sure I express the wishes of the farmers of the country when I say that if laws are to be enacted for the purpose of regulating prices of farm products, then laws ought to be enacted for the purpose of regulating prices of machinery, appliances, and other things farmers must buy in carrying on their work; and I will say also that, in my opinion, the farmers are not asking favors at the hands of the Government by way of price fixing or other regulatory provision; they are and have been willing that their products shall take their chances in the markets of the world if they can simply have the same chance and advantage that are enjoyed by men in other lines of business.

And in conclusion, I wish to say another word respecting the bill we are now considering. The Committee on Agriculture has unanimously decided that it should comply with the request of the Attorney General in the matter of amendments to the food-control act. It has reported his amendments just as he presented them. We wish to place in his hands every weapon that can be used and which he promises to use in his effort to reduce the high cost of living. I wish I had more faith in his promise that he will produce substantial results. In placing in his hands, and the hands of the President, additional weapons—if they are additional—we are going to remove every last excuse they offer for failure thus far to act, and from now on it will be up to them to produce results.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote upon my amendment.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate is exhausted on the amendment. I have an amendment to offer, as have some other gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. If this amendment passes, I shall move to strike out the words "or both" at the end of the line.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Georgia ask unanimous consent that the amendment be reported. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 16, noes 85.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 23, after the word "both," strike out "Provided" and all of lines 24 and 25, and on page 4 strike out all of lines 1 to 9, both inclusive.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, we have listened to a great number of campaign speeches and orations for home consumption this afternoon. I say this without any reflection upon the gentlemen who have spoken. At the same time I offer the thought that when a matter of the importance of this measure comes before this House we ought to stick as nearly as possible to the subject.

Before proceeding further I wish to remark that the manner in which this measure is brought before the House is a glaring example of how legislation should not be considered in a deliberative body. The Agricultural Committee had their last hearing yesterday afternoon. The newspapers published a report yesterday that the bill had been introduced. I sent a page over to the office of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] to get a copy. Word came back that it had not been given its number—in other words, it had not been printed. A copy of it was not procurable until its consideration was asked for on the floor of this House this afternoon. I objected to its immediate consideration then until I had secured time to oppose it. With marvelous slight of hand, the Rules Committee brought forth from its sleeve a rule requiring its immediate consideration. And, of course, it was put through with lightning speed. Apparently there was no one to oppose it. The Agricultural Committee were unanimous! Democrat and Republican alike on the committee were pledged to its passage and parceled out the time among its friends. Common decency, it seems, should have prompted them to inquire whether anyone was opposed to the bill and give him some say in the disposition of the time. The result has been that, while Members were recognized to talk on the bill, they used their time to abuse the administration of the food law in the past and predicted its failure in the future. Verily the wish was father to the thought! In the few minutes that I have I will try to speak to the merits.

I ask you gentlemen to just gather around in this committee, and let us put our heads together. Take the bill in your hand and look at page 3, line 23, and see what was done with the recommendation of the Attorney General that certain legislation be enacted in order to give the administration power to enforce the food-control act. Has the Agriculture Committee complied with the request of the administration? I want to tell you that the committee has not complied with the request of the administration. If this bill becomes a law, I can see you gentlemen next year making campaign capital out of the fact that the administration has failed to reduce the high cost of living under the useless machinery you have here provided.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Pardon me, but I can not yield. Let us stick to the point. The administration requested that containers be introduced into the bill, and wearing apparel, and that the penalty be decreased. You did all of that. But at the bottom of the bill you insert a clause which cuts the very vitals out of the measure. Let us read it:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, horticulturist, vineyardist, planter, ranchman, dairyman, stockman, or other agriculturist, with respect to the farm products produced or raised upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by him.

What does this mean? Let us look at the bill. What does it provide? It makes a criminal offense out of certain conduct.

It makes it a penal offense, felony, if you please, punishable by $5,000 fine and two years' imprisonment, for any person willfully to destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof; makes it unlawful to permit waste or willfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in connection with that production, manufacture, or disposition. It makes it a criminal offense to hoard, as defined by section 6 of this act. It makes it a criminal offense to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any necessaries. It makes it a criminal offense to engage in any discriminatory and unfair or any deceptive or wasteful practice or device or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries of life. They are all criminal offenses, punishable by fine and imprisonment. Then you put this miserable, devitalizing proviso at the end of the section which emasculates it and takes the force and vitality out of it. Why, you might just as well have altered the whole section and provided that the farmer, the gardener, the agriculturist, the ranchman, the stockman may destroy property for such purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. I can hardly get at the meat of this matter in the short time I have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed under the agreement.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am asking unanimous consent.

Mr. MACCRATE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have five minutes outside of the time fixed. The gentleman has stayed here all the afternoon in opposition to the bill, and I think he is entitled to have at least 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that his colleague may proceed for five minutes, not to be included in the time already fixed.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the time has been fixed, and I think that should be adhered to.

Mr. MACCRATE. That was in the committee, and it can be changed in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Last year when the dairymen's association in New York State were trying to gouge the people by forcing them to pay a further increase in the price of milk, and when thousands of infants were languishing because their parents were unable to provide them with this essential food, thousands of quarts of milk were fed to the hogs and cattle or ruthlessly dumped into the wayside ditches. Under this committee amendment the dairyman responsible for such wastefulness would be absolutely exempt from punishment. Time and again crops have been permitted to rot and fruit permitted to drop to the ground and decay simply because the word had been passed around that the putting of such products on the market would bring about a surplusage which would reduce prices. In the meantime the consumers, who could not afford to pay the high prices exacted by the conspirators, were obliged to take another hitch in their belt or substitute some other food not cornered by unconscionable devices.

The whole section seems very promising until we read down to the proviso which the Agricultural Committee has introduced exempting the farmer, the gardener, the horticulturist, the vineyardist, the planter, the ranchman, the dairyman, the stockman, or other agriculturist from the operation of the law. Others may not destroy the necessaries of life for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply. Others may not commit waste or deterioration of the necessaries of life. Others may not hoard the necessaries of life. Others may not monopolize such necessaries or engage in discriminatory, unfair, deceptive, or wasteful practices or devices or make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge in handling or dealing with such necessaries. Others may not conspire, combine, agree, or arrange to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, or dealing in such necessaries. Others may not restrict the supply of such necessaries or their distribution or exact excessive prices for such necessaries. And if they do they commit a criminal offense punishable by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both. But the sainted farmer, the gardener, the horticulturist, the vineyardist, the planter, the ranchman, the dairyman, the stockman, and the whole brood of agriculturists may do all of these wicked things with absolute immunity. If this is not class legislation with a vengeance, I pray you to show me an example in the whole history of American legislation which comes nearer to being a violation of the principles which underlie our system of government. A crime, I have always thought, was just as heinous whether committed by a farmer, a barber, or a college professor; whether it was committed in the country or in the city, in the forest, the field, the mine, or in the mart. But, according to this new philosophy, the man in the country can destroy, waste, hoard, monopolize, cheat, and conspire with perfect impunity. What an outrage upon common sense and public decency.

But gentlemen say, when I talk to them outside of the precincts of this Chamber—for none of them have discussed it within—that the reason why the farmer is exempted from punishment for the commission of these crimes is that he is never guilty of such offenses. The farmer and his allies mentioned in the bill never destroy the necessaries of life for the purpose of enhancing the price; they never throw the milk to the hogs that ought to be furnished, at reasonable prices, to starving babies, or dump it in the ditches; they never allow their crops to rot in the fields or fruits to decay in their orchards. Oh, no! They never do such things! Well, if they do not, why do they want to be kept free from punishment? If they never offend, they surely can never fear a penalty. Is it possible that you gentlemen of the Agricultural Committee only want to open the door to them out of politeness? Is it possible that you only want to provide sanctuary for your own preferred and privileged class, and that you never expect them to seek shelter for their misdeeds at the Holy Rail? No, gentlemen, I suspect that, since you are so intent to provide a special sanctuary for your friends, you must have some lingering notion or suspicion that sooner or later they will stand in need of salvation.

The title of this bill tells the whole story. It is a bill to encourage the production, to conserve the supply, and control the distribution of food products and fuel. Who produces food products? Why, the farmer, the gardener, the vinyardist, the planter, the ranchman, the dairyman, and the stockman. And yet every one of them is exempt from the penalties provided by this bill! They have carte blanche. They can do anything they please. They can commit any crime short of murder, and very often the denial of food through willful waste and unlawful combinations may mean murder; they may commit all of these crimes and have absolute immunity. If that is so, what is the aim, purpose, or utility of this bill? Camouflage—nothing more! It is not sincere. It is not honest. It is not intended to be of any use. You know, in your heart of hearts, that it is bound to be a failure; that no Attorney General or Food Administrator, were he gifted as the archangel himself, will be able to accomplish anything under this bill. You are only sowing the seeds of discord; planting mistrust in the hearts of the people who have their eyes centered, with longing gaze, upon this Congress to give them a modicum of relief. You are cheating them. You are deceiving them. They are crying for help, and you are throwing to them a life line loaded with lead.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to say a word with reference to the amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from New York to show you gentlemen how unjust it is to put in the provision on page 3, line 23, exempting farmers, etc. And I desire to call your attention to a concrete example in reference to my own city of St. Louis. We get our milk supply from what is known as the Southern Illinois Milk Producers' Association. We are dependent upon them almost entirely for our milk supply. The Southern Illinois Milk Producers' Association fixes the price that the dairies of St. Louis must pay for the milk, and in effect also fixes the price that the consumers must pay. Now, in the last few months milk has been increased in price in the city of St. Louis. So that now it is almost impossible for the poor children, for the sick children, and for the poor people, for the sick in the hospitals, to get the milk that is necessary for the sustenance of their lives.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Here we are exempting those people. Why on earth should the Milk Producers' Association be exempted in fixing the price of milk which is necessary to the health of the infants of a great city like St. Louis as well as of other places? Gentlemen, there is no need for this. The provision on the opposite page is now law. I do not expect to argue against that, unjust though it is, but I urge you gentlemen not to put into effect this other provision on page 3, because if you do there is nothing on earth to stop the Milk Producers' Association of Southern Illinois, that consists of over 4,000 members, from fixing the price and increasing the price again next week to 18 cents a pint, and they can increase it the week after to 24 cents if they want to do so, because by this bill you are exempting them from the provisions of this act. Is there anything in the world that is more necessary for people, for the children, for the infants, for the sick in the hospitals, than good milk? I offer, Mr. Chairman, this suggestion with the hope that you gentlemen will strike out that provision.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I want to offer as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from New York that the first provision beginning in line 23 with the word "provided" and ending on page 4, line 3, with the words "or cultivated by him," be stricken out. I offer that as an amendment, and I ask to have it reported as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. DYER. As a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DYER offers as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. GRIFFIN: On page 3, line 23, after the word "both," strike out all of the proviso down to and including the word "him," in line 3, page 4.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ELSTON. The amendment of the gentleman from New York, as I understand it, strikes out 10 or 15 continuous lines containing two or three different subjects.

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; it strikes out two provisions.

Mr. ELSTON. Two provisions. Would it be in order as an independent amendment to propose to strike out merely the provision exempting the farmers and thereafter putting in an amendment to subject the associations named here to the provisions of this act?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] is in order. The question is on the substitute.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am opposed to the profiteer, whether he does a $10,000 or a $10,000,000 business annually.

I am in favor of this bill because it punishes the profiteer, be he great or small, who fattens his bank account on the blood of little children.

I am in favor of this bill because it has teeth and gathers in all profiteers, whereas the bill passed by the last Congress did not.

I am in favor of this bill because it will bring at least a partial measure of relief to 4,000,000 returned soldiers and their families and a hundred million other patriotic Americans who have sacrificed in their country's behalf.

I am in favor of this bill because it gives a degree of relief and hope to the masses of American people whose sense of right and justice has been outraged.

While considering this measure I shall also consider briefly the high cost of living.

RELENTLESS WAR ON PROFITEERS.

During my campaign in 1918 I declared for "relentless war on profiteers," and since hearing the report of the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department and having made some study of the report of the Federal Trade Commission regarding profiteers, like the Queen of Sheba, I must exclaim "The half has never yet been told." No, Mr. Chairman, the half has never yet been dreamed.

Far be it from me to in any way intimate or give the impression that every successful merchant is a profiteer. Such an insinuation against the vast majority of our smaller merchants would be wholly unjustified. Nevertheless while there are more milch cows, more beef cattle, more hogs, more sheep, more poultry, more butter, and more eggs in the United States to-day than ever before, while there are more foodstuffs and more clothing in the United States than ever before, these necessities of life have been locked in the cold-storage plants of the Big Five packers and in Army and other warehouses out of reach of the consumers, there to rot in the one instance and to be forced higher and higher in price in the other.

SUPPLY AND DEMAND—LABOR AND FINANCE AS CAUSATIVE FACTORS.

Greater food production and more complete utilization of all that is grown; greater production at the hands of labor along all lines; economy and the simple life, when practiced by the masses of our people, will all help to solve the high cost of living. Supply and demand are great and potent economic factors with which we must always reckon.

Another factor which must be taken into consideration is the food and clothing shortage in Europe, and the necessity for their coming into our markets and outbidding our own buyers, because they must have the foods and they must have the supplies.

But with all of these questions considered, there is in my opinion another great underlying cause of the excessive prices along all lines.

The civilized and responsible countries of the world have increased the amount of paper money in circulation during the last four years from 8 billions up to 36 billions of dollars. In other words, on an average, every man, woman, and child in all of these countries throughout the world now has $4.50 instead of $1. The withdrawal of this vast circulating medium can not be done in a month nor a year, but in all probability prices of labor and of all commodities will remain high until the finances of the world are readjusted.

WHEAT AND COTTON.

Argument has been made in this Congress against the farmers of our country. An effort has been made to show that the farmer is responsible for high food prices and living costs, but I want to repeat with emphasis what I have said before:

Two dollar and twenty-six cent wheat, in my opinion, is not responsible for the high cost of living and in reality has but little to do with excessive food costs. I make this statement regardless of the frequent retort from our southern friends, who seem to resent the fixed price on wheat and at times insinuate that the guarantee may be lifted at any time. As a matter of fact there is every reason to believe the guarantee on wheat "has guaranteed" to the wheat grower a lower price for 1917, 1918, and 1919, than he would have received on an open market.

Take the next great staple, cotton, as an illustration. It has not been regulated, but nevertheless has sold during the same period for 300 per cent of its normal value, and cotton lands which sold in 1917 for $60 an acre are now bringing $150 on a brisk market.

The farmer's bushel of $2.26 wheat comes on our tables in the form of biscuits and buns and costs the consumer $14.05 on an average throughout the United States, and this wide margin between the producer and consumer in the greatest necessity of life undoubtedly pulls heavily on the family purse strings.

ARMY FOOD STORES.

Another and a very important factor in the high cost of living is in the enormous Army food stores that were necessarily and properly placed in our warehouses in 1917 and 1918.

These were bought with the people's money, and on the signing of the armistice and as soon as the ink was well dried they should have been sold to the masses.

It is sad to note that during the time of soaring prices and the stress on every hand, millions and multiplied millions of cans of these foods have softened and become unfit for use. Three million five hundred thousand pounds of ham has deteriorated in two warehouses alone. Only three weeks ago we were informed in Congress that from the Government warehouse in Baltimore 16 men with wheelbarrows have been engaged since last February wheeling out and destroying foodstuffs that have spoiled in the plant, and which could have been given the public in good condition last December had the proper action been taken. There was enough of these foodstuffs to fill a large adjacent swamp. Day after day they wheeled these foods into the swamp and burned and destroyed them until the ground was so littered with cans that they could no longer haul over it, and then the whole mass was covered with a layer of dirt and the same process of food destruction continued. This has been going on for the past five months. Millions of cans have suffered the same fate in Chicago and warehouses at other points.

STAR-CHAMBER PROCEEDINGS.

Several months ago the War Department called a conference to decide on the disposition of these enormous food stores. It is interesting to learn that this conference was attended by seven generals and by representatives of practically every big packing company in America.

Wilson & Co., packers, were represented; Cudahy & Co., packers, were represented; Libby, McNeil & Libby, packers, were represented; Morris & Co., packers, were represented; Armour & Co., packers, were represented; Swift & Co., packers, were represented. In all, the "Big Five" or "Big Six" had 10 representatives present to look after their packers' interests while helping to outline a food policy for this country. No one else was present. Very naturally they decided that the disposition of these foodstuffs in America would demoralize their local markets and therefore decided that the foods should be sold in Europe.

INSIDE INFORMATION.

Mr. Chairman, during this debate a letter has come to me from one of my constituents, a wholesale grocer in the State of Washington. His letter throws much light on this subject of profiteering and food hoarding. He says:

The position of the Government is not understandable; it seems to be on both sides of the fence.

The Government itself has been the largest hoarder of foodstuffs. Even after it was evident that the Army would not need the enormous amounts of foodstuffs which the Government had purchased, they were not released, and the wholesale grocers of the country were assured that they would not be released under conditions which would tend to break the market and thereby reduce the cost of the commodities to the public. (See bulletin and special letters issued by the National Wholesale Grocers' Association, head office, New York City; especially see files since February 1, 1919.) The Government thereby aided in keeping up the cost of commodities.

It should be borne in mind that the big packers are now also the big canners and food hoarders of the country, and just here I wish to corroborate the statement of my wholesale grocer by reproducing a letter from the War Department which was read from this floor by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] a few days ago:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
PURCHASE, STORAGE, AND TRAFFIC DIVISION,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR OF PURCHASE AND STORAGE,
Washington, March 17, 1919.

FRANK GERBER,
President National Canners' Association, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GERBER: Your letter of March 15 to Maj. Gen. H. L. Rogers has been referred to me for reply.

I am glad to be able to relieve your mind on the subject of any surplus of canned vegetables to be dumped on the market.

Acting along lines suggested by you—

Suggested by the president of the Canners' Association, mind you—canned peas, corn, squash, and string beans will be added to the ration list, which has always contained canned tomatoes. This will entirely dispose of our stock and eliminate surplus.

I trust this will relieve your mind and those of your associates in the Canners' Association.

Yours, very truly,
A. M. DAVIS,
Colonel, Quartermaster Corps, Director of Storage.

They would "relieve the mind" of the Canners' Association by denying food to hungry children.

The Government itself has been doing considerable profiteering; certain foodstuffs have been offered to the highest bidders in such large blocks that only large interests could afford to bid on them; i. e., bids would not be accepted on small quantities. The items in many instances came on a bare market, and big speculators and pools of speculators could and did bid very high prices for these goods, which gave them a practical corner on the market, and they in turn resold them to the jobbers and thereby greatly advanced prices, and naturally by the time they reached the consumer they were far above the Government's original cost. A few examples:

The Government asked for bids and sold to a Newark, N. J., broker 2,000,000 pounds of prunes, stored in Portland, Oreg., at 22½ cents per pound. These prunes cost the Government something like 11½ cents. The broker in turn sold them at 29 cents to jobbers, the jobbers added their profit and sold to the retailer, and on down the line. The concern purchasing these prunes were speculators and the Government turned foodstuffs bought with public money over to speculators. A short time ago another block of prunes was sold at 23 cents; both these lots came onto a bare market which again tempted speculators.

Dried peaches were practically unobtainable and in large demand. The Government in May and June sold by bid to James Dunbar, of Portland, Oreg., a block of 40,000 pounds of dried peaches at 19½ cents per pound; he in turn sold them to jobbers at 23 cents per pound, and in some instances possibly more. This was a pure speculation on Mr. Dunbar's part. These peaches cost the Government about 11 cents.

A large stock of canned peas, in storage at Mare Island, were sold to Mebius & Drescher, of Sacramento, Calif., at 97 cents per dozen cans. There were far more peas than this firm could ever use, but the market was bare of this grade and they knew they would have no difficulty in selling them to other jobbers at a profit, which they did, reselling for $1.20; this was pure speculation and the Government was a party to it.

If the Government was really sincere in wishing to reduce the cost of living, why were not these goods sold either to the jobber or direct to the retailer at a nominal amount above the cost of the goods, and why were they not sold in small blocks? The public would then have received the benefit of the reduced prices, but as it was handled a few of the select cleaned up a nice profit on public goods.

These are the observations of my wholesale grocer.

$30,000,000 WORSE THAN WASTED.

A few days ago these shocking revelations in regard to the handling of the surplus Army food were presented to Congress by a special investigating committee, and at that time a suggestion was made that the remaining vast quantities yet in storage at Boston, New York, Baltimore, Newport News, Atlanta, Chicago, St. Louis, New Orleans, Fort Sam Houston, El Paso, Omaha, and San Francisco should be disposed of direct to the people and delivered by parcel post.

This plan has appealed to the Secretary of War, and he has announced that he will, within a short time, carry out the program.

While accurate information is very difficult to obtain, it seems there is yet in storage approximately 500,000,000 pounds of well-preserved foods. To deliver this by parcel post will cost the consumer in postage alone $35,000,000, or if this is not collected as parcel post, then the equivalent amount must be paid from the taxpayers' pockets, since that amount represents the actual normal parcel-post costs.

The mails will be demoralized, city delivery will be almost impossible. To bring this 500,000,000 pounds of foodstuffs to the consuming public at the lowest possible cost and at the least inconvenience I have proposed to the War Department that these foods be shipped in carload lots by fast freight to all the larger cities in each State; transportation charges to be deducted from the receipts, and the sales to be made under the direction of the local postmasters, by the assistance of the Red Cross or otherwise, as the Secretary of War may direct in any given case.

This would enable the purchasers in large centers of population to buy and carry; would reduce the parcel-post charges to those living in near-by country sections; would prevent the demoralization of the Postal Service; and would save the consumer and the taxpayer at least $30,000,000.

It is interesting to note that it costs $410 to freight a car of canned goods from San Francisco, our nearest general warehouse, to the State of Washington, while it costs $2,432 to parcel post the same goods to the State of Washington in 25-pound packages.

The plan I have here outlined would bring the world's greatest food sale to the doors of the consuming public and would embrace every element of fairness and economy for the consumer and the Government.

The War Department admits that my plan possesses every advantage over the plan they are about to follow, but that they can not change; they must pursue their plan.

Mr. Chairman, to be firm and persistent in the pursuit of a policy is usually a good trait, but to be so bound up in red tape that you can not embrace a new but plain and simple business proposition that would save $30,000,000 to the poor people of this country, who are struggling to reduce the cost of living, is the essence of inefficiency.

Why not cut away $30,000,000 of red tape? Why not adopt business methods? Why not effect a real saving to the purchasers instead of an imaginary one?

There is yet an opportunity for mayors and other public officials to buy in carload lots and bring these foods to the frugal buyers with a great saving. Let us hope they will embrace the opportunity, so that the pantry of those who are forced to live the simple life may once more be well stocked without their paying heavy tribute to the packers, the hoarders, the profiteers, both great and small, whose unpatriotic practices we are trying to curb.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on my amendment to strike out the first proviso.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. All time is exhausted on the substitute.

Mr. ANDERSON. Move to strike out the last word of the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DYER. I ask for a division, in order to see whether or not they want the little children of the country to starve.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 79.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the original amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 86.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. Can amendments be offered and voted upon at this time, or later?

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed.

Mr. DYER. I do not want to take the time. The agreement as to time does not prevent the offering of amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not. Amendments may be offered and voted on at the expiration of the time fixed.

Mr. DYER. Can I offer it now or will I be compelled to wait?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON] has been recognized, and offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I ask the Clerk to read, and I have another one, that I will offer later, which I would like also to have him read now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ELSTON: Page 3, line 24, after the word "provided," strike out the remainder of line 24 and all of line 25. And on page 4, all of lines 1 and 2 and that part of line 3 ending with the word "him."

And—

On page 4, line 9, after the word "them," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "but such association shall be subject to the provisions of this act."

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I submit two amendments. In addition to adding clothing, and so forth, the bill provides for practically one further thing, namely, a penalty in section 4 for certain acts which are therein prohibited. In the original act of August 10, 1917, of which this bill is amendatory, these acts specified in section 4 were prohibited as against all citizens, including farmers; and farmers were therein penalized for doing the very acts which now they are exempted from in the bill proposed by the committee.

When you passed the Lever Act a year ago you declared that all of the acts specified in section 4 were against public policy, against the interests of the people, and you provided that farmers as well as all other citizens should be punished for doing them. In section 6 of the original act you declared that the accumulation or storage or saving of products of their own farms by farmers should not be regarded as hoarding. That is in the act at the present time. The farmer can now hoard all he pleases. A year ago you said the farmer could not do any of these prohibited acts, except hoarding, and now you say he can do them.

In the language of section 4 you permit a farmer now to destroy the necessaries of life to enhance the price or restrict supply. You permit him knowingly to commit waste. You permit him to willfully permit preventable deterioration. You permit him to hoard, as you did before.

You permit him to monopolize. You permit him to engage in discrimination and deception and wasteful practices or devices. You permit him to make unjust or unreasonable rates or charges in handling or dealing with necessaries. You permit him to conspire or combine to limit facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing with necessaries. You permit him to conspire and combine to restrict the supply of any necessaries. You permit him to conspire or combine to restrict the distribution of any necessaries. You permit him to conspire or combine to prevent, limit, or lessen production in order to enhance prices of necessaries. You permit him to conspire or combine to exact excessive prices. You permit him to conspire or combine to aid or abet the doing of acts made unlawful by this section.

Every one of those acts is prohibited in section 4. By your exemption every one of them may under this bill be committed with impunity by the farmer. Is that fair? Can you look any honest farmer in the face and say: "We have passed a law forbidding everyone except the farmer from doing acts which are declared to be inherently against the public interest. We permitted you to do it because you are a farmer. The bill provides that these acts must be willful and criminal in their intent and contrary to the public interest. The guilty person must first have a criminal intent. He must willfully do these prohibited things. It is not right, it is not fair, to exempt the farmer from the consequences of such wrongdoing. This is a grave matter of policy with which we are dealing. This extraordinary preference to one class will rise to plague you in the future when other classes make similar demands. I am friendly to the farmer, and I can not believe that he wants this peculiar privilege to do wrong with impunity.

I believe, further, that the associations mentioned in section 2 of the bill, and which are rightfully permitted to exist, should be subjected to the provisions of this act, and should not be permitted to do the things that are prohibited here. That is the effect of my second amendment. Cooperative farmers' organizations should not be disturbed by this bill, but they should certainly not be permitted to commit the wrongful acts mentioned in section 4. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from California.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the first and second amendments read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, respecting these exemptions, to which some exception has been taken, I wish to call your attention to the fact that under the original act practically the same exemptions are found in sections 5 and 6. I also call your attention to the fact that the same exemptions are contained in the Clayton Act, copy of which I have here before me.

I would like to direct your attention to the wording of the bill as it pertains to these exemptions. On page 4, lines 1 and 2, you will note that these exemptions apply "with respect to farm products produced or raised upon land owned, leased, or cultivated by him"—the farmer.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. With pleasure.

Mr. VAILE. Does the gentleman think that with respect to farm products, so owned or so raised on land owned or leased by the farmer, the farmer should be allowed to exact excessive profits for any necessaries?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I wish to say to the gentleman that, because of the very nature of the farmer's case under present conditions, such a thing is an impossibility.

Mr. VAILE. Does the gentleman think that the farmer should be permitted to prevent, limit, or lessen the production of necessaries in order to enhance prices?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I know that there are plenty of people who would avail themselves of an opportunity to attempt to put the farmer "in bad" when the farmer might choose not to harvest a crop because of a yield so small that the crop would not even pay for the labor necessary to harvest it.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DYER. Would the gentleman include dairymen as a combination where there are 4,000 of them combined to fix the price of milk?

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. I yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. TINCHER. Is not the answer to that question to say to the gentleman that if the amendment is carried, for instance, and he does not allow the dairymen to combine to sell their milk, he will hinder production? The fact is that the dairyman is not charging excessive prices for his milk, but the profiteering is with the middleman?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Yes; the gentleman is entirely correct. The committee had a great many reports bearing on the subject of dairy products in our hearings, and we found, for example, down in Newark, N. J., that the mayor of Newark has engaged in the milk business to relieve Newark citizens from outrageous prices charged by a city milk trust. He found that he could buy milk from the farmers at 7 cents a quart and sell it at 11 cents, whereas the dealers were buying it at 7 cents from the same farmers and selling it at 18 cents. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the committee has found to its abundant satisfaction that there have been numerous efforts already in certain communities to take advantage of some law by wholesale food monopolists in an endeavor to persecute the farmer rather than prosecute him. There is no instance on record where the farmers have ever been guilty of profiteering.

As to the matter of profiteering and its application to the farmer, there was one incident that came to the attention of the committee to which I wish to call the attention of the House. Just a few days ago four gentlemen came down to Washington and took dinner with another gentleman, an expert of the Department of Agriculture, at one of the Washington hotels. Those five gentlemen had an ordinary dinner, consisting of meat and two or three vegetables, a cup of coffee, and dessert. Their bill was $11. These men, who were all farmers, together with the agricultural expert, figured out what the farmer received for the products constituting that meal, and they found that he received just 82 cents. The hotel charged $11. It is needless to say who was the profiteer in this instance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may direct my remarks to the general provisions of this bill, let me say that the purpose of the proposed amendment to the act of August 10, 1917, is to give the executive department of the Government unrestricted opportunity to move against food profiteers by the shortest possible route. There are many gentlemen on both sides of the House who were laboring under the conviction that the act of August 10, 1917, gave the Executive and the Department of Justice all of the freedom and initiative necessary to proceed along any lines they might desire in their efforts to prosecute profiteers. I am among those who shared this opinion and interpretation of the law. However, the President and the Attorney General have requested amendments to section 4 of the act, so as to include wearing apparel and food containers, and also to provide a penalty for the violation of the section.

It is but fair to the Committee on Agriculture of the Sixty-fifth Congress to remind you that that committee, in addition to including severe penalties for the violation of sections 5, 6, 8, and 9 of the act, which sections include most of the provisions of section 4, also desired to include a penalty in section 4, but were advised by the Department of Justice not to do so.

There was no suggestion from anyone that further authority was needed until the recent request of the Department of Justice was brought to the attention of the committee and the Congress. Our committee has proceeded as rapidly as possible to recommend to the Congress the amendments now proposed by the Department of Justice, which the committee of the Sixty-fifth Congress desired to include when the original bill was first recommended.

In view of these facts, if any blame is to be attached to anyone for the failure of section 4 to have included a penalty for its violation prior to this time, that blame certainly rests with the Executive or the Department of Justice and not with the Congress. I say this in plain justice to the Members of the Sixty-fifth Congress, as well as to the present Congress.

Plainly every Member of the Congress is exceedingly anxious to see a reduction in the price of all necessaries, but all Congress can do is to place in the hands of the Executive such laws as will, when enforced, bring about the desired result. The remarks of some gentlemen on this floor, as well as many letters from constituents and editorials by newspaper men, would lead the public to believe that the whole welfare of the American people, living expenses included, rests wholly with Congress.

Is it necessary to remind Members on either side of this House or to remind the American people that this Government is composed of three branches—legislative, executive, and judicial—and that the only power that rests with Congress is that of legislation? The enforcement of law by provisions of the Constitution itself rests wholly with the executive department; and, in view of the fact that during the past six years, with prices constantly mounting higher and higher, and with no apparent effort of any kind on the part of the administration to enforce the laws with which the Congress has empowered it, is it any wonder that certain gentlemen question whether this slight amendment we are now debating, when enacted into law, will receive any more effective attention at the hands of the Executive than have the other laws that have been completely ignored?

Mr. Chairman, it is only fair to the Congress that these facts be stated. It is the height of insincerity and unfair play for gentlemen on the minority side of this House to rise and charge that the present Republican majority has it within its power to reduce the high cost of living, and to charge that during the three brief months that we have been in session here legislation of such a character should have been forthcoming. We have all, on both sides of the House, been laboring under the impression that an abundance of regulatory law, even drastic law, was already on the statute books; and if we will all be honest with ourselves we still believe that such was the case. The fact of the matter is that no king, prince, or potentate in the history of governments among men has ever had such complete and unrestricted authority placed in his hands as has our present Chief Executive. The people of this country have viewed with growing alarm for several years the vast powers that have been accorded the Executive by the Congress under the pretext of war necessity. The Sixty-fourth and Sixty-fifth Congresses, by the vote of Members on both sides of the House, acted almost without reservation in placing every power at the disposal of the President that he asked for.

I hope this Congress will now, in view of the seeming emergency that confronts us, pass this amendment substantially as recommended by the committee, in a faithful effort to correct the alleged defect that the Department of Justice believes will untie its hands for effective action. The few months that the original act will remain a law will give opportunity to the department to test out its theories; and while we all know that the real causes of present high prices are far-reaching and deep-seated and can not be very greatly or permanently affected by this stirring of the surface, let us hope and pray that at least some temporary relief may be given to a suffering public, of which we are a part.

Mr. Chairman, if I may express an humble opinion, it is to the effect that the present seeming converging of circumstances and conditions just at the time when that honorable body at the other end of this building is seeking to study and understand for the first time the most revolutionary and far-reaching document that was ever presented to any people, and to study this document entirely within its rights as a treaty-ratifying body, in an effort to safeguard the future of our Republic, that such converging of conditions and circumstances as now exist constitutes only a stage play in which one man is hoping to emerge as the hero, just as has been the case three or four other times during the present administration. The man who said "All the world is a stage and all the people are players" may have been only partly right, but that the present administration is constantly staging plays in an endeavor to feature one individual is clear to every Member of this House who is honest with himself in the light of facts extending over the past six years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky makes a similar request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON].

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, what is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report it.

Mr. BLANTON. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. O'CONNELL. I would like to hear what we are going to vote on.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made, and the Chair has no choice. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the second amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. ELSTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I suppose that the House, generally, is in favor of the passage of this bill as being one step in the right direction. What I wish to discuss in the few minutes allotted to me is the necessity of further and other legislation.

This bill provides for the punishment of the profiteer and seeks thus to give relief to the people.

What is a profiteer? What is making an unreasonable profit which should subject one to punishment?

As I understand it, if I go into a store to buy a suit of clothes, the merchant is entitled to charge me a profit. What is the basis of this right? Why is he so entitled?

As I understand it, it is because he has rendered me an economic service in making the suit available, in bringing it within my reach from the place of manufacture, etc.

Therefore, in addition to the cost of the article and the expense incident to the transaction he is entitled to charge, and I must in justice pay the value of his service.

If this be the justification of profits, it follows that all he is entitled to charge and collect and all that I am in justice bound to pay is the reasonable value of his services.

If I do not so pay, I have received from him something for which I have given him no equivalent, and if he makes me pay more than the value he has taken from me money for which he has given me nothing. The seller is then entitled of right and in justice only to the reasonable value of the economic service he renders the buyer.

To the extent that he takes more, in an economic sense he is a profiteer, in my opinion.

Now, in America to-day this unjustifiable profit taking is well-nigh universal. It is not alone big business or little business. It is practically all business. Because half the world has not produced anything for four years and thus the world's supply of usable things have been reduced vastly in amount, a natural monopoly has been created in behalf of practically every one who has anything to sell with the result that he may put almost any profit he chooses upon his wares and find some one to give him his price. The result is that profits have now no sort of relation to the value of economic service rendered, but are based instead upon the extremity of the necessity of the buyer to have the things purchased, and since the world is buying from us and there is not enough to supply the world in plenty, we have a market where all the competition is between the buyers to get the articles and none between sellers to dispose of them, with the result that price levels have steadily climbed and the end is not yet in sight.

It is human nature to get as much for an article of sale as possible. Each man excuses himself on the theory that everything he buys costs him more; that others are profiteering at his expense; and that he must perforce in the mad competition make all he can. Each inspires the other, with the result that we run around in a vicious circle and the price levels continue to climb.

Let us assume that no one is particularly blameworthy—a violent assumption in many instances—yet the fact remains that all over the country the sellers of things are taking profits for which there is no justification from an economic standpoint, with the result that the people are actually suffering.

The wages and salaries of the great mass of Americans have not advanced in proportion to this ballooning of profits, and the citizen is suffering because in the process of distribution and sometimes in production the sellers of goods, because of the necessity of the world, are exacting profits out of all proportion to the services rendered. The people are demanding relief, and they are looking confidently to Congress for it. They are restless, and I fear the results if they be disappointed in their expectations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have said that unjustifiable profit taking is well-nigh universal, and I say that this bill, while very good in its way, is not adequate. It empowers the Attorney General to prosecute profiteers. But it ends with the declaration of peace, maybe in a month or two, and then what is the remedy? But even though it did not so end, how will it operate generally? It may result in the prosecution of a few business concerns which, because of their size, are conspicuous. But unlawful profit taking is universal, and the average citizen as a rule pays more toll to his local profiteer than to the concern of huge size. Can the Attorney General prosecute practically all business in the United States? To state the question is to answer it.

What is a reasonable profit is a question of many elements in each particular business, and since under the law this in each case is a question for the jury, the tedious, slow, and laborious work of preventing profiteering by this method is readily apparent.

But it is urged that prevailing profit taking is justifiable, because it is the result of the operation of the law of supply and demand; that the fact that people will pay the prices demanded is proof that the articles are worth the price; in short, that a thing is worth what it will bring.

In normal times this rough statement of the result of the normal operation of the law of supply and demand is accurate enough. It is true enough under normal conditions when there is a normal supply of usuable things in the world; that with sellers competing to sell and buyers with freedom to buy or not or to postpone purchase, this interaction of the forces of the desires of sellers to sell and buyers to buy results in a price which is the fair value of the economic service rendered by those engaged in production and distribution, but it is not a standard when freedom of action is taken away from either buyer or seller and he must perforce sell or buy, as the case may be, regardless of price.

If there were only one loaf of bread in Washington and nothing else to eat was obtainable and people were starving, no one would argue that because some multimillionaire resident of the city was glad to give a million dollars for it to keep life in his child it was worth it. The millionaire had no choice. He was as truly coerced by force of circumstances as he would have had physical force been used.

To a modified extent such a condition exists in the world to-day. There is such a scarcity that the competition is entirely between buyers, who must buy through necessity, and sellers may take advantage of this to charge what profit they please.

The mass of the people feel that they are in this situation and that advantage is taken of their necessities to take from them money for which they are given nothing in return, and the rumblings of deep indignation is heard and unrest grows each day apace. If we do not heed, I feel sure that strikes and lockouts will occur and that we will have social, industrial, and political upheavals that none of us desire and which will but aggravate an otherwise bad situation.

Mr. Chairman, I know that the world scarcity must needs produce a higher price level than existed before. I believe that it is sound policy to encourage production by permitting the farmer to get what he can for his produce and all those who engage in producing from the ground, unless they have a monopoly of the supply. Neither has it been my observation that the farmers are receiving unjustifiable profits, but I do say, Mr. Chairman, that the distribution, and in many instances the manufacture, of goods is filled with unjustifiable profit taking, with the result that by the time the goods have passed through the hands of the many who handle them between the field and factory and the purchaser their cost is much enhanced over what they would have been had only a reasonable profit been taken.

But permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not mean that the farmer or anyone else should be permitted to charge more than he is justly entitled to. Unjustifiable profit taking, trading upon the necessities of mankind, is indefensible, regardless of the occupation of the one guilty of the offense.

By virtue of the world scarcity, the inflation of our currency and credits, with our low denomination bonds circulating largely as currency, a higher price level must needs come. With Europe in her desolation buying and forced to buy from us at our prices, which the domestic buyer must needs meet, an advance in price over former times is inevitable. But this is one question and the regulation of the amount of profit to be taken by those engaged in the distribution and manufacture of the products of the earth is another. This should be the reasonable value of the economic service rendered—no more, no less.

But, Mr. Chairman, the question arises, assuming that my positions are well taken, What is proposed to remedy the situation?

It is hoped that good prices for farm products will increase production and the number of farmers. The Federal Reserve Board might do much in the gradual restriction of credits, and so forth, and yet we have the very practical question remaining as to how to regulate what is called profiteering.

I do not make pretensions to expertness, neither have I the privilege of serving on any of the committees having this matter within their jurisdiction, but several possible remedies have occurred to me as worthy of consideration.

As I have stated, by virtue of the world shortage we have a market where all the competition is between buyers and none between sellers, with the result that prices have steadily risen ever higher and higher.

It might be well to restore this competition somewhat if possible.

If all goods shipped in interstate commerce were required to be stamped or tagged with the price at which they were sold, the buyer would have some opportunity of knowing how much advance over cost he was being required to pay. The profiteer would be presented with the choice of charging a reasonable profit or else losing his business, for if he were unreasonable in his charges his business would certainly go from him.

It will be urged against this that goods cease to be interstate commerce as soon as they are delivered at destination and the profiteer could obliterate the stamp or tear off the tag.

This is true, but it is highly probable that it would not be done. This act of itself would almost be an express declaration that excessive profits were being taken and the purchasers after being acquainted with the law requiring the marking would hardly deal with a seller destroying them.

It would also be urged, doubtless, that many kinds of goods are not capable of being so marked. This is true, but the majority are, and it is submitted that enough would be to make the remedy efficacious.

Another possible remedy is the reinstitution of the food-regulation act, much extended in its scope. Prices were fixed and profits regulated during the war, and the same is possible again.

Again, the taxing power of the Government might be used.

A tax of 100 per cent on all profits above a certain amount on articles might well tend to lower profits while still producing revenues for the Government.

Permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, that I have not given these several suggested remedies critical study. I have not had the time or the opportunity as yet. There are many questions involving the powers of Congress under the Constitution that would require thought and study as well as the practical effect of the measures if adopted. I suggest them for what they are worth, believing them worthy of thoughtful consideration. Of this I am sure, that the Congress should use what power it has under the Constitution for the relief of the people.

It might be urged that it would take time to put some of these measures in operation, to determine what are reasonable profits, and so forth. This may be true, but the opportunity of the profiteer will continue for several years. The world scarcity, the fundamental cause of higher prices, and the opportunity of the profiteer will continue until Europe gets back to production. We know not when this will be, several years certainly. Are we to have no remedy because the efficacious ones take some little time to put them in operation?

Again, the inflation of currency and extension of credits will continue for some time also, and, with these conditions continuing, we may rest assured that unjustifiable profit taking will likewise continue unless it is in some way regulated.

It will be said that these remedies are drastic. Indeed, they are. But the situation is drastic.

Present conditions are making Socialists and Bolsheviki by the hundreds every day. A hungry stomach wants food, not theory. Discontent from bad conditions does not want a learned explanation of how the conditions were brought about. It wants the conditions remedied.

The man of wealth can well afford to curtail his profits lest his profits and his business be taken away from him.

The man of moderate means, desiring to take advantage of the present opportunity for profit taking to make himself wealthy, can well afford to curb his ambitions lest a political and industrial revolution and universal strike reduce him from competency to poverty.

The great question before the Congress is remedying unjustifiable profit taking, whether gentlemen recognize it or not, and the earnest and thoughtful and careful attention of the Congress should be given it.

If the Congress does not, then the people will hold us responsible.

Mr. Chairman, as a mere partisan, were I to indulge that feeling alone, I would be glad to see the Republican Party neglect its duty in this matter. You are in the majority, and the responsibility is yours. You control the committees and you control the House. You have said that you were efficient and that you were able. Now is your opportunity and this is your duty. Meet it or meet the condemnation of the people.

But we do not feel as partisans. We desire to assist you in every way possible for the relief of the people of this country, but we are more or less powerless to move unless you decide upon some plan or will turn the attention of the committees to the solution of these questions and the framing of appropriate legislation.

But it is urged that undertaking to regulate profit taking is new and novel.

Our law from its earliest days has condemned monopolies and combines in restraint of trade. Yes, even by the old common law. Why did the law take this position? What wrong was done by a monopoly? What was the thing which was sought to be avoided? Clearly, it was to prevent the creation by artificial means of a situation wherein the buyer had no choice but to buy at the seller's price. The offense was the taking advantage of the buyer's necessities. Now, in the world to-day there is a natural monopoly created in behalf of sellers by virtue of a great world scarcity. Why can not Government protect the citizen against the abuses of a natural monopoly as well as an artificial one? It seems to me that there can not be any distinction in principle.

I sincerely hope, Mr. Chairman, that the Congress will give this question the consideration it deserves. If it does not, I fear the consequences.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

Mr. RUCKER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE] may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. The time has been limited.

Mr. ANDERSON. The time has been limited and everybody who has already spoken has been limited to five minutes, and therefore I object.

Mr. RUCKER. I should like to have five minutes in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HAUGEN. The time has been limited.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman from Minnesota withdraw his objection? The gentleman from Mississippi is presenting a line of argument here which is very interesting——

Mr. ANDERSON. I am very much interested in what the gentleman is saying, but in justice to gentlemen who have already spoken and who would like to speak, I think the time should not be extended.

Mr. RUCKER. It will not aid the cause of which the Committee on Agriculture are proponents to cut off debate on a measure in which everybody is concerned. It will not do any good for them to arrogate to themselves the sole right of discussion.

Mr. MONDELL. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. I desire to say to the gentleman from Missouri that the Committee on Agriculture do not desire to arrogate to themselves any sole right of discussion.

Mr. DYER. I ask for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. DYER. I desire to offer an amendment to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. DYER. I offer an amendment at the bottom of page 3, in the last line, to strike out the word "dairymen."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DYER: Page 3, line 25, and page 4, line 1, strike out the word "dairymen."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. DYER) there were—ayes 16, noes 86.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 3, lines 1 and 2, strike out the words "willfully."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That sections 8 and 9 of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, be, and the same are hereby, repealed: Provided, That any offense committed in violation of said sections 8 and 9, prior to the passage of this act, may be prosecuted and the penalties prescribed therein enforced in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

Mr. HAUGEN and Mr. RUCKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, is recognized.

Mr. HAUGEN. I give way to the distinguished gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the courtesy shown me by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. In the few minutes allotted me I want to congratulate the House upon the fact that we are to-day responding to a practically universal demand of the American people; and confiding in the wisdom, integrity, and patriotism of the great Committee on Agriculture, I have voted with that committee against all amendments, although I think the bill might be improved by amendment. A moment ago the eloquent and distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE] asked the question, What is a profiteer? The war has fastened upon this Nation of ours a great many new conditions. It has also brought to us new words, phrases, and designations. A long time ago, down in the old State of Mississippi, a man who prevaricated was denounced as a liar. To-day the polite and approved way to speak of him is to say that he is a camouflager. Years ago when people in their greed and avarice took the public by the throat and held up the people of the country, honest men denounced them as robbers. Now you speak of them as profiteers. I like the old-time mode of expression. Such people are robbers, pure and simple, and ought not to be permitted to continue their extortionate methods. Gentlemen here have talked and some have offered amendments seeking to strike out the exemption of certain classes of people from the operation of the law, and yet while one gentleman eloquently recited all of the things which might be done and for which the farmer would not be amenable to the criminal section of this bill, I want to say to him that most all of the permissions referred to are related to things which the farmer could not do if he wanted to, and obviously would not do if he could. Therefore there is nothing in that argument.

Let me say one word more, and I want now to address myself largely to the head of the Committee on Agriculture, and especially to the distinguished chairman, the great leader of a great political party, having in his power the opportunity to scatter sunshine and joy into the homes of millions of people if he will but avail himself of the opportunity.

I hope this bill will become law and that it will bring more happiness and satisfaction and relieve more distress over the land than any man has predicted for it. I do not believe the remedies provided in this bill will remedy all the evils from which men suffer. I believe we can do it in other ways, and I want to suggest to the great and distinguished gentleman of this great and distinguished committee [Mr. HAUGEN] that there is one way by which it can be done to a large extent, or at least to an appreciable extent, to an extent that can not be laughed aside, which everybody knows will accomplish great good, and which affects a very essential and necessary article of food. I suggest to the distinguished gentleman who presides over this great committee that one way by which he can cheapen one item of food, universally used, is to take off the abominable prohibitory tax on colored oleomargarine, and let that valuable article go on the markets on its merits. That simple piece of legislation would undoubtedly reduce the cost of butter. Let the law of supply and demand regulate the use and price of butter and oleomargarine, too. If people want it, let them have it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. I have not the time to discuss this matter fully, but I throw out this suggestion now and will discuss it more at length at a future date. I challenge any man to show that oleomargarine is not as palatable, as nutritious, as wholesome, as clean, as any butter that can be made in any creamery in the land, or that it can not be sold much cheaper. Why not let the men who toil for day wages have oleomargarine if they want to use it? Why not let it be sold as oleomargarine, on its own merits, and permit consumers who desire to do so to use it? I know that certain interests in the country will start a propaganda and that the farmers in my district, as in the gentleman's district, will be told that the product of their cows will be ruined if we reduce the cost of butter by putting oleomargarine on the market upon its merits. I say to you, however, that the farmers in the section from which I come are generous people; they are brave-hearted and patriotic people; and that if it should lower the price of butter produced on the farm, even then, in the interest of the multitude of suffering people over our land, they are willing to bear the burden and pay the price. I hope this committee will proceed along that line, as well as many others.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] in his eloquent speech has referred to the subject of oleomargarine, but I fear if we undertook to discuss that we would not be through in a week. I suggest that we have had a good deal of debate and that it is getting late. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I move that debate upon the bill and all amendments be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania: Page 4, line 14, after the numerals "1917," insert "and section 8, act of August 2, 1886, as amended by section 3, act of May 9, 1902."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not germane.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have an opportunity to explain the meaning of my amendment. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa insist upon the point of order?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDDLESTON: On page 4, add a new section at end of bill:

SEC. 4. That section 24 of the said act approved August 10, 1917, be amended by striking out the word "when" where same first occurs in said section and inserting the words "at the end of two years after."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment. It is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that the point is well taken, and the point of order is sustained. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment—to strike out the proviso in section 3, which is entirely useless.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 15, after the word "repealed," strike out the proviso which reads as follows:

"Provided, That any offense committed in violation of said sections 8 and 9 prior to the passage of this act may be prosecuted and the penalties prescribed therein enforced in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I think these gentlemen should make their requests in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to this request?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I object for the present. Let the gentlemen make their requests in the House, not in the committee.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to these requests?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I object for the present.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TEMPLE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8624, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. That is provided in the rule. So the previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the question on the amendments in gross.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] relative to regulating rents.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands a separate vote on the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "foods," insert the words "dwellings and dwelling rooms let for hire."

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I ask for a division.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman's motion is not in order while the House is dividing.

The SPEAKER. It is in order. Eight gentlemen in the affirmative have arisen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 77, noes 132.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers. I also make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the motion is dilatory, as the vote just taken shows a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. No; it is not. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-five Members are present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers on my amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 1, noes 220.

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama demands tellers on his amendment. Seventeen gentlemen have risen in the affirmative, not a sufficient number.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the other amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GRIFFIN. To offer the following motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from New York opposed to the bill?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; I am.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GRIFFIN moves to recommit the bill with instructions to report the same immediately with the following amendments: Page 3, line 23, after the word "both," strike out the word "Provided" and all of lines 24 and 25; and on page 4 strike out lines 1 and 2; and on line 3 the words "or cultivated by him"; and on line after them strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "but such associations shall be subject to this act."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. GRIFFIN) there were—ayes 24, noes 200.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns this evening it adjourn until Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that, in order to give the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] an opportunity to submit a request.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have the right to extend their remarks on this bill for five legislative days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that every Member have the right to extend his remarks on this bill for five legislative days. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8117. An act for the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Falls, Wyoming County, Pa.

H. R. 8076. An act authorizing the county of Montgomery, Tenn., to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River within 7 miles of Clarksville, Tenn.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 6323. An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LARSEN, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of illness.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand four memorials submitted by the governor of Georgia on bills now before the House, and I ask unanimous consent to insert them in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD certain memorials from the governor of Georgia. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. To what do the memorials refer?

Mr. UPSHAW. One is a resolution concerning Federal pensions; another a resolution relating to the Fordney bill, the purpose of which is to place high duty on potash; another a resolution memorializing Congress to investigate the high cost of living; and another, indorsing a bill to provide six months' pay for all honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines. As I have stated, all relate to bills now pending before the House.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Monday, August 25, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 23, 1919.

Rev. John Paul Tyler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Lord of all the earth, God of our fathers, send upon us, we beseech Thee, this day Thy Holy Spirit, that with Thy wisdom and with Thy grace we may so direct the affairs committed to our care that Thy name may be glorified; that with unselfish devotion to Thee and the coming of the day of Thy righteousness on the earth we may give ourselves to the tasks before us. Bless our President. Bless our country and every home in it. Bless our world. We ask it for Jesus' sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 8536) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

A bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 8076. An act authorizing the county of Montgomery, Tenn., to construct a bridge across the Cumberland River within 7 miles of Clarksville, Tenn.; and

H. R. 8117. An act for the construction of a bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Falls, Wyoming County, Pa.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

INDIANS IN UTAH (S. DOC. NO. 78).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 4th instant, certain information relative to the Indians in Duchesne and Uintah Counties, Utah, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McNARY. On yesterday, at the request of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], who was detained in the Agricultural Committee, I presented a memorial from the State Farm Bureau Federations of Iowa, Nebraska, Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois, relative to the causes of the high cost of living, and so forth, and asked that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from North Dakota has since informed me that he desired to have the memorial printed in the RECORD. I ask that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McNARY. I ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT ISSUED BY FARM BUREAU FEDERATION OFFICERS OF IOWA, NEBRASKA, INDIANA, OHIO, AND ILLINOIS IN THEIR CONFERENCE WITH PRESIDENT WILSON TO-DAY.

AUGUST 14, 1919.

The members of the State Farm Bureau Federations must now decide the extent of next year's food production on their farms.

Present agitation over the high cost of living attempts to saddle in large measure responsibility for high prices on the farmers who, while discerning their share, justly refuse to bear any great part of the blame.

In the present chaotic state of affairs the farmer says to him who wishes to arrive at the facts as they are, "Come, let us reason together."

In the whirl of affairs clear thinking is difficult, formulation of statements well-nigh impossible.

To-day, however, the Farm Bureau Federations of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Nebraska, potent factors for increasing production in the heart of the meat, milk, and grain producing sections of the United States, indorse through their authorized officers the statements following:

J. C. CROCKER,
President Nebraska Farm Bureau Association.
O. E. BRADFUTE,
President Ohio Farm Bureau Federation.
J. G. BROWN,
President Indiana Federation of Farmers' Associations.
D. O. THOMPSON,
Secretary Illinois Agricultural Association.
J. R. HOWARD,
President Iowa Farm Bureau Federation.

The high cost of living is not due to the original price of the farm product to the grower. The Government minimum price for wheat does not determine the cost of a loaf of bread. Fixing a resale price at $1.50 per bushel would affect, if reflected to the consumer, very little the cost of living for the average family. Average wheat consumption in this country is about 6½ bushels per year per person. Reduction in price to $1.50 per bushel would mean a saving of $4.94 per person, or $24.70 for a family of five. This is nothing at all compared with the reduction in wheat acreage and correspondingly small crop next season, which would result from discouragement of the producer.

The high cost of living is not due to the storage of meats, vegetables, fruits, eggs, and poultry in the season when these are produced in surplus against the season of short supply. Popular as is the hue and cry against storage of foodstuffs, it is a palpable fact that modern storage methods are the greatest food savers in the world, at one and the same time saving food in time of plenty and supplying it in time of scarcity, and, moreover, maintaining a steadier level of prices throughout all seasons for any given commodity. Indiscriminate restrictions on food storage will serve only to wastefully glut the market in the harvest season of meats, vegetables, fruits, eggs, and poultry at a price disastrous to the producer and create a dearth of these products out of season at a prohibitive price. Food storage for speculative purposes is intolerable.

The high cost of living is not due to exportation of food and clothing any more than it is due to our heavy exports of manufactured goods, machinery, etc., of which the farmer is a heavy purchaser. An embargo on foodstuffs to bring down the high cost of living will be as demoralizing to American agriculture as the embargo placed on foodstuffs was to French agriculture in the time of Louis XIV. Moreover, the high cost of living is not merely a local or national consideration. It is a world matter. Applying a first-aid remedy at home to create and foster anarchy and revolution abroad should not be the policy of the United States even at this critical juncture.

The high cost of living is not due to lack of desire or effort on the part of the farmers to produce to the limit of their physical ability. Not within the knowledge of the present generation have all the farmers of the country extended their every energy in a consecrated effort to produce to the last kernel and pound all the grain and meat products needed to feed a hungry world. The operation of the short-hour day in industrial centers and a talk of shorter hours and ever-advancing pay has made it well-nigh impossible for anywhere near the normal supply of help to be maintained on farms. The daylight-saving plan has mitigated against maximum production by reducing materially the practical working hours of the day on the farm, especially in so far as the hired man's labor is concerned. Following a beautiful promise of a bountiful wheat harvest, a most destructive attack of scab and rust cut the wheat yield very materially. Untimely heat and drouth shortened the oat crop and adversely affected the corn crop. The long hours and strenuous diligence of the farm operator have, in spite of these adverse circumstances, put the crop across; as he harvests and markets it he wonders somewhat if he, with his disregard of the time clock and his recompense based on a gambling game in which the natural elements deal the yield and the middle men deal the price, has not been pulling the short end of the hitch. The farmer has not struck, walked out, or otherwise slackened in production. He has increased his effort, extended his operations to the limit of physical ability and financial credit, and striven to feed the world, believing the world would fairly and gladly recompense him. Instead he finds in many prominent places those who, in their eagerness to find an answer where there is none, and to shun the real facts of the situation, point to him with scorn and malevolence, saying, "Thou art the culprit."

The high cost of living is due to a stagnation in production of manufactured goods and prepared foodstuffs. Every labor strike that shuts down any plant engaged in the preparation of foods or the making of clothing, that shuts down a mine or a mill, adds to the high cost of living. Shortly after a strike of the United States yards and packing plant employees the wholesale price of fresh meats advanced 15 to 35 per cent, directly due to the short kill and consequent small supply of fresh meats. In Chicago 100,000 men have been out of work for months, and all building operations have been at a standstill because the carpenters refuse to work for 92½ cents an hour. This strike tied up building operations in many small towns within a radius of 100 miles of the city, as well as in Chicago. Following the Chicago street car strike, a strike of the Aurora, Elgin & Chicago Electric Railway employees, which threw thousands out of employment on account of lack of electric power in the towns along this line, left the small Aurora meat-packing house without power to run its refrigerating plant. There were about 10,000 pounds of meat spoiling. It is said the manager appealed to the head of the union for power to keep this refrigerating plant running and prevent the spoiling of this meat, and the insolent reply hurled back was "I don't give a damn if all the meat in the United States rots." Such are a few, the daily press records the many, instances of premeditated stagnation in production which shortens supply and plays into the hands of those who fix the price to the consumer.

The high cost of living is due to price manipulation and extravagant profits of middle men. Referring again to a Chicago situation. A small group of milk-wagon drivers at one of the milk-distributing plants struck for $44 per week and regular commissions. All the other milk distributers at once declared a lockout against their drivers. After two or three days of sparring the employers agreed to meet the demands of the men, and announced a 1 cent per quart advance in the price of milk to the consuming public. Analysis of the arithmetic of the case shows that it took about four-tenths of that cent to pay the employees, and that six-tenths of each cent was added to the profits of the distributers. Food on the table costs out of all proportion to the price to the producer. Part of the reason for this is due to the short hours and high wages for labor, part to the exorbitant prices of the several middle men between the producer and the consumer, and a considerable part to the extravagant practices of the consumer in methods of purchasing supplies. Without going into an analysis of who gets it, compare the difference in price of choice beef on the hoof at 18 cents per pound with that of a moderate meal for five at one of Washington's modest hotels, the meal consisting of steak, potatoes, corn, bread and butter, and coffee, and costing $11. Of this $11, the producer of the food, the farmer, got about as follows: Beef, 2 pounds, 36 cents; potatoes, 13 cents; bread, 2 cents; butter, 7 cents; coffee, cream, and sugar, 4 cents; corn, 20 cents; making a total of 82 cents. This is about 7 per cent of the total cost. A 50 per cent reduction in the price of these products to the producer would have lessened the total cost of the whole meal on the hotel table only 41 cents, smaller by half than the customary 10 per cent tip, which, by the way, is not included in the above price for the meal. This illustration shows the extremes of exorbitant profits of the middle men and of extravagant practices of the consumers in purchasing, including probably all the evils that are contributing in large measure to the high cost of living to the consumer. A reduction to the producer in the price of these foodstuffs to a point which would stagnate production of grains, produce, and meats would have an inconsequential effect upon final prices to the consumer.

The high cost of living is due to the failure of practically all folks to practice even ordinary economy in public and private life. A program of hard road building, contracted at almost twice prewar costs per mile, due to advance of price of material and labor, has been delayed and interfered with because of the fact that delivery of building material has been delayed by tying up of transportation facilities. This question of lack of economy in public spending was brought within the focus of the American public's attention early in July, when the railway brotherhoods demanded of President Wilson that he bring down the cost of living immediately, threatening a demand in wage increase amounting to a total of $800,000,000 a year, payable necessarily from one of two sources, revenues from increase of freight rates or from a deficiency appropriation, either of which would add to the cost of living. A lack of practicing economies in private life may be illustrated without end. Theaters and places of amusement, resorts, and watering places are crowded with beautifully gowned women and handsomely tailored men. The price of shoe shines has doubled and trebled, yet one must wait his turn, though he could shine his own shoes at home for less than 1 cent. So illustrations might be multiplied, all showing that lack of practicing plain economy is a great contributing factor in maintaining the high cost of living.

The high cost of living is due to shifting individual responsibility for the present state of affairs, and each component of the people of the Nation seeking self-satisfaction rather than the answer to the great world question. This is our national state of mind. Instead of doing our national and individual best to produce more goods, so that there will be enough for all at a reasonable price, each is trying to better his own condition at the expense of the other fellow. There is a limited supply in the world. Just now we are quarreling over the division of what we have. If we would stop quarreling and go to work, we would soon increase production, so that all would have plenty.

Under war pressure, when fighting a foreign foe, farm production was not shortened; it was increased tremendously. Upon the fair or unfair attitude and action of capitalistic monopolies and organized labor, upon the sanity of their next immediate pronouncements affecting national and international affairs, depends the decision of the American farmer in planning his next year's program of work. Now is the seeding season for wheat. Now is the time the farmer selects the gilts and brood sows that will give birth to the 1920 pig crop. Now is the time when the dairyman determines the number of cows he wants to milk twice daily for the next year. Now is the time the cattle feeder determines whether he will sell his corn as beef or as corn.

Now is the time silos must be filled, if feeding operations are to be engaged in. Now is the time the farm woman determines the size of next year's flock of poultry. Now is the time when the farmer plans the next year's corn acreage. In short, now is the season when the efficient farmer plans the whole 1920 program. Right now the American farmer holds in his hand the power to determine quite definitely the size of next year's crop of wheat, meat, milk, cheese, butter, poultry, eggs; in short, all foodstuffs, and with that to determine whether or not the world's table will be abundantly supplied next year. The American farmer, individually and in his organization, recognizes his responsibility in this matter, provided, however, that every other good American citizen or foreigner within our borders will let the scales drop from his own eyes and witness that he has an individual and an organized responsibility that can not be shifted. The American farmer does not sympathize with artificial or political quackery for befogging the real issues, but impotent in giving even passing relief. The American farmer is willing to squarely meet the issue. If prices cut to the bone all along the line—farm products, wages, manufactured goods, rents, wholesalers' and retailers' profits—will bring the desired result, which he rather doubts, he will go as far along that road as any, but he will not go alone. Let the whole brotherhood of man go the full route. If increased production will clarify the situation, the American farmer will jointly, with all of his fellow citizens, buckle his belt for a most strenuous campaign of production; but here again he is determined that he will not work alone.

If capitalistic monopoly wants enough food produced that it may be feasted, if organized labor wants food produced that it may be fed, if the do-nothing twaddlers want enough food produced so that they may occasionally eat, let them stand forth now at this time, when the farmer must determine his 1920 food-production program, and declare by deeds—cutting out of profiteering in goods and wages, going honestly to the business of preparing and purveying the necessities of life, going honestly to the job of doing a full day's work for a full day's pay—their willingness to cooperate. Failure of these forces to do this now will be a boomerang that ere the next cycle of the seasons will effect a condition of living now undreamed.

Mr. MYERS. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the joint memorial was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 1.

A memorial to the Congress of the United States for amendment of the act of Congress approved May 30, 1908, opening for entry and settlement under the land laws of the United States the Fort Peck Indian Reservation.

Your memorialists, members of the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, in extraordinary session assembled, the senate and house concurring, respectfully represent:

Whereas under and pursuant to the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 30, 1908, opening to settlement and entry under the land laws of the United States lands formerly within the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, settlement and entry have been made by a large number of actual bona fide settlers, who have made the initial payment required under said act of Congress and have cultivated said lands as required by the land laws of the United States; and

Whereas said act of Congress, in opening for settlement and entry said lands, provides that entrymen of any of said lands shall pay to the Government the appraised value thereof in five equal annual payments, and that the full appraised value of said lands shall be paid before title can be obtained by the entryman; and

Whereas said settlers upon said lands, owing to extreme and unusual drought conditions existing during the past four years, have been unable to produce remunerative crops of grains or grasses, and all agricultural crops upon said lands have been practically a total failure during said period; and

Whereas settlers upon said lands, by reason of the aforesaid failures, are unable to pay the Government price for said lands and are unable to continue their residence upon the same, and unless relief is granted to them they will be compelled to abandon their homesteads, lose their improvements, and forfeit the payments heretofore made; and

Whereas, owing to said failures of crops and owing to the fact that title to said lands can not be acquired until the full appraised value thereof is paid, the settlers aforesaid are unable to obtain credit for the necessities of life, and because of lack of title, are unable to borrow money with which to sustain themselves; and

Whereas if said lands were subject to the provisions of the homestead laws, where title could be obtained without payment of the appraised value, these settlers could obtain credit and could readily borrow money with which to sustain life and continue the cultivation of their homesteads: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate of the sixteenth legislative assembly in extraordinary session assembled (the house of representatives concurring), That we hereby petition the Congress of the United States to amend the act of Congress approved May 30, 1908, to the end that no payments be required from entrymen of lands within the territory formerly the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, and that settlers and entrymen upon said land be required only to comply with the homestead and desert-land laws of the United States; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded to the Secretary of the United States Senate and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each United States Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Montana.

President of the Senate.

Mr. MYERS. I present a joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

There being no objection, the joint memorial was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial 2.

Memorializing the Congress of the United States for the passage of H. R. 7026, now pending in that honorable body.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas there is now pending before the Senate and House of Representatives H. R. 7026, introduced by the Hon. CARL W. RIDDICK, Representative from Montana, providing for the appropriation of $50,000,000 out of any money in the Treasury in the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the provision of the reclamation act in the construction of irrigation projects and units thereon, especially in the arid land sections, the same to be reimbursed in accordance with the provisions of the reclamation act and providing, in the matter of employment in such construction, work shall be given, so far as practicable, to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to needy farmers; and

Whereas the many citizens of the State of Montana are known to be greatly in need of employment where the crops of grain in many parts of the State of Montana are a total failure; and

Whereas the expenditure of a reasonable amount of money in the construction of dams, reservoirs, and irrigation canals and ditches would furnish employment for many needy farmers and others who are unemployed and who are ready, able, and willing to work; and the expenditure of a reasonable amount of money would be of material benefit in reclaiming arid lands and would be of material benefit to the State of Montana and to the Federal Government, and would conserve the waters from the mountainous regions for use at times when same would be of material benefit; and

Whereas an emergency exists and it is necessary that prompt action be taken, and it is the belief of this legislative assembly in special session assembled that it is the duty of the best citizenship of this State and the United States to help reclaim unproductive areas of the State of Montana and other States in the Northwest: Therefore be it

Resolved, by the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana in extraordinary session assembled, That we earnestly petition the Congress of the United States to pass H. R. 7026; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Montana transmit copies of this memorial to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to our Senators and Representatives of the State of Montana, with the request that they use every effort to secure the immediate passage of H. House joint memorial 1.

A memorial to Congress relating to the production, sale, and distribution of live stock and live-stock products, dairy products, poultry, and poultry products in commerce.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, in extraordinary session convened, respectfully represent and petition: That—

Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States a bill known as Senate bill 2202, introduced by the Hon. W. S. KENYON, Senator from Iowa, providing for the licensing by the Federal Government of all persons engaged in the business of slaughtering live stock, preparing live-stock products for sale, engaged in the business in commerce of buying, selling, or shipping live stock for slaughter and live-stock products, conducting or operating stockyards in which live stock is handled in commerce, performing services in commerce with respect to live stock handled on a commission basis or in connection with stockyards, collecting in connection with stockyards and distributing in commerce live-stock market quotations or live-stock market news, buying, selling, and shipping dairy products, poultry and poultry products in commerce, and providing for the regulation and control thereof by the Federal Government; and

Whereas the legislative assembly is of the belief that all such industries and business should be subjected to Federal control and regulation; and

Whereas the legislative assembly is of the belief that the said Senate bill 2202 presents legislation effecting that object: Be it therefore

Resolved by the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana (the House and Senate concurring). That we do respectfully petition and earnestly pray the honorable Congress of the United States for the passage of Senate bill 2202; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the Senate of the United States; that a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the House of Representatives of the United States; and that copies of this memorial be transmitted by the secretary of state of the State of Montana to the Senators and Representatives in Congress of the State of Montana with a request that they use every effort to bring about an accomplishment of the ends and purposes herein set forth.

House joint memorial 9.

Petitioning the Congress of the United States to create "The Temple of the Gods National Monument."

To the Senate and the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialists, the governor and the Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully represent:

On the public domain within the boundaries of the Sevier National Forest, in the Pink Mountain region, near Tropic, Garfield County, Utah, there is a canyon popularly referred to as "Bryce's Canyon," which has become famed for its wonderful natural beauty. Inasmuch as the State and Federal Governments have indicated a desire that the natural attractions of our State and our country be protected and preserved for the enjoyment of posterity, therefore, your memorialists respectfully urge that the Congress of the United States set aside for the use and enjoyment of the people a suitable area embracing "Bryce's Canyon" as a national monument under the name of "The Temple of the Gods National Monument."

(Passed Mar. 13, 1919. Approved Mar. 13, 1919. In effect Mar. 13, 1919.)

Senate joint memorial 2.

Petitioning the Congress of the United States of America to make certain lands formerly within the boundaries of the Uintah Indian Reservation subject to homestead.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the governor and the Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully represent that:

Whereas certain lands located in Wasatch, Duchesne, and Uintah Counties, in the State of Utah, and formerly within the boundaries of the former Uintah Indian Reservation, are now held and set apart as Indian grazing lands; and

Whereas under the terms of the opening of said Uintah Reservation the lands so set apart as grazing lands were to be nonirrigable lands; and

Whereas said lands are mostly situated under irrigation canals and rivers and easily irrigated, and in order that our returning soldiers may obtain suitable farms and homes: Now, therefore,

The governor and Legislature of the State of Utah respectfully petition that the said lands so set apart as Indian grazing lands may be made subject to entry under the homestead laws, and that the Indians of said former Uintah Reservation shall receive $1.25 for each acre of said grazing land taken by homesteaders. The $1.25 per acre received for said land shall be paid by the homesteader.

House joint memorial 3.

Petitioning the Congress of the United States to pass the necessary legislation to retain on the civil-service eligible list soldiers, sailors, or marines who have lost their preference right by reason of being in the military or naval service of the United States.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the governor and Legislature of the State of Utah, respectfully represent that:

Whereas the civil-service laws require that one who has passed the examination and been placed upon the eligible list must accept service within one year thereafter, and, unless they do so, are dropped from the eligible list; and

Whereas many soldiers, sailors, and marines, who successfully passed such examination and were placed on the eligible list, have been unable to accept service within one year thereafter, by reason of being absent from their homes in the military or naval service of the United States; and

Whereas it is deemed unfair to such soldiers, sailors, and marines that they lost their place on said eligible list under such circumstances:

Now, therefore, the governor and the Legislature of the State of Utah respectfully petition that necessary legislation be enacted to extend the time in which such soldiers, sailors, and marines may accept service, and that they shall not lose their place upon the eligible list.

Senate joint memorial 4.

Petitioning the United States Government to authorize the building of a railroad into the Uintah Basin in the State of Utah.

To the President of the United States, and to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Utah, respectfully petition the assistance of Congress and the Federal Railroad Administration in securing the construction of a railroad into the Uintah Basin, which comprises a large section of the eastern part of Utah. The counties of Uintah and Duchesne, situated in this basin, contain the largest undeveloped resources of the State of Utah, and its potential possibilities are lying dormant awaiting transportation facilities.

This basin is more than 100 miles in length and more than 50 miles in width, with lands the fertility and productivity of which are not excelled in the State, a veritable Commonwealth capable of easily sustaining a population of 75,000 people in addition to the 25,000 now living there.

This valley has already been partially developed in anticipation of a railroad and in this condition answered the call of the Nation by the production of prodigious war crops. It is surrounded by mountains affording the best grazing lands for cattle and sheep and covered with the finest timber. Its oil shale deposits are said to be the largest in the world. Gilsonite, elatorite, ozokerite, asphaltum, and coal are found in large quantities, and these, with other minerals, are now mined to some extent, but await a railroad for full development.

The waters of this basin, now developed, irrigate 225,000 acres, no part of which is intensively cultivated for want of adequate transportation facilities to outside markets.

In addition to the irrigation water now used, figures of the United States Geological Survey show that 400,000 acre-feet of water annually run to waste from the Duchesne, the principal river of the basin, which if applied to the additional irrigable land available would produce annually $4,000,000.

Storage reservoir sites are available for conserving all of this water. Proposed projects by the Reclamation Service will irrigate 175,000 acres additional to that already under canals and 100,000 horsepower can be harnessed from the streams of the basin.

The development of this basin with the building of a railroad and the proposed reclamation projects will afford employment and opportunities for farm and home making for our returning soldiers, sailors, and marines, and our sons will not then be compelled to go to other States or foreign countries to earn a livelihood.

The Federal Government is the only source to which we can now look for assistance in constructing a railroad into the Uintah Basin, and we earnestly petition Congress to take such action as may be necessary to assist us in securing proper transportation facilities to develop the vast resources of this rich section of our State.

Resolved, That copies of this memorial be engrossed and forwarded one each to the President of the United States, the Senate, and House of Representatives of the United States, the Director of the Federal Railroad Administration, and to each of the Senators and Representatives from Utah in Congress, with a request that they use every legitimate effort to promote the objects of this memorial.

(Passed Mar. 10, 1919. Approved Mar. 11, 1919. In effect Mar. 11, 1919.)

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I present resolutions adopted by the Minnehaha League of Women Voters, with headquarters at Sioux Falls, S. Dak., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINNEHAHA LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS,
Sioux Falls, S. Dak., August 18, 1919.

To Senator ED. S. JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.:

The following resolutions were unanimously indorsed at a recent meeting of the Minnehaha League of Women Voters:

"Whereas the war brought to a victorious close by the associated power of the free nations of the world was above all else a war to end war and protect human rights: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we urge the ratification of the league of nations covenant by the United States. We believe that this covenant aims at promoting the liberty, progress, and orderly development of the world; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Senators of South Dakota, at Washington, D. C., and to the Hon. William H. Taft, president of the League to Enforce Peace.

"MINNEHAHA LEAGUE OF WOMEN VOTERS,
"By Mrs. L. L. LEAVITT, President.
"Mrs. E. R. BUCK, Corresponding Secretary.
"Mrs. A. C. HINCKLEY, Organizer."

CONDITIONS IN THE VIRGIN ISLANDS.

Mr. KENYON. From the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico I report back favorably, with an amendment, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 69) appointing a commission to report on conditions in the Virgin Islands, and I submit a report (No. 160) thereon. I think every Senator will be in favor of doing something at least toward securing information about the Virgin Islands. I desire at this time to give notice that at some future day I shall move to take up for consideration the joint resolution and shall address the Senate in relation thereto. The report is short, and I should like to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. KENYON this day, as follows:

The Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 69) appointing a commission to report on conditions in the Virgin Islands, having had the same under consideration, report thereon with the recommendation that the joint resolution do pass with an amendment as follows:

On page 2, line 7, strike out "$3,000" and insert "$2,500."

The following testimony is appended and made a part of this report:

The history of the acquisition of the Virgin Islands by the United States is well known. The government of these islands is now conducted under an act passed March 3, 1917, which provided a temporary government for them. Undoubtedly the United States would have paid more attention to the Virgin Islands had it not been that shortly thereafter we were precipitated into war, and these islands seem almost to have been forgotten.

The committee heard Mr. Francis, who had been selected at a mass meeting, held at St. Thomas, to come to Congress and present the situation in behalf of the working people of the islands. It is apparent from his testimony and from other sources of information that there is urgent need for the United States to pass laws for the government of the Virgin Islands. Danish customs, Danish laws, Danish methods of judicial procedure, are still in vogue in the islands. There is great need to Americanize them. The land question needs serious attention. According to the testimony of Mr. Francis, the natives own but 3 per cent of the land of the islands. The rest is owned by Danes or by those to whom the Germans have transferred title. Under their system of taxation, unoccupied land bears no tax. The owners of the land will not lease it or sell it. This is resulting in a condition where the inhabitants of these islands have no part in the sale of the land and no chance to make a living out of agriculture. Denmark had contemplated some kind of a homestead law shortly before turning the islands over to us, but the intention was not consummated into action.

Most of the food comes from the United States. On the island of St. Croix considerable sugar is raised. St. Thomas is famous for its port, but American ships pass by St. Thomas and coal at the Barbadoes. The reason of this the committee does not know, but presumably it is because of the high charges at the coal docks at St. Thomas, which are not the property of the United States. Some agricultural interests can be developed in the islands. On the island of St. John, bay leaves are prolific, and out of this comes the bay rum for which the islands are famous.

The people of the islands, at least many of them, believe that some form of government should be adopted instead of the present system of government under the Navy. The testimony before the committee showed that the judge of the islands was also a member of the council making the laws, a member of the city council, chief of police, and collector of taxes. This kind of government is not in keeping with American ideals. An income of $300 per year is required in order to exercise the right of suffrage. Under this only 321 people in the islands can vote. It puts a few men in control practically of the islands.

According to one witness, conditions were better 40 years ago than they are now. Originally the islands produced pineapples, sugar, and everything that grows in tropical countries. Now that the Danes and their friends have taken all the lands practically the islands have gone into a decline. The great necessity is some land law that will enable the people to acquire land. The Americans, since their occupation, have done considerable work along lines of sanitation. Apparently there has been no improvement as to education. The people of the islands feel that they have been neglected by the United States; that when the American flag went up in the Virgin Islands it should have been followed by American laws, customs, and ideals as soon as possible. These people are pleading to be Americanized. There are great possibilities in these islands. They should no longer be neglected. Congress is without sufficient information to act in these matters, and there would be great benefit in the opinion of the committee in having a small commission visit the islands for the purpose of studying conditions and reporting to Congress on a plan of action covering land laws, methods of taxation, and everything else that might be helpful in solving the problems.

This resolution provides for three Members of the Senate to be appointed by the Vice President and three Members of the House to be appointed by the Speaker. The expenses are limited to the actual expense of the members of the commission and limited to the sum of $2,500. Commissions of this character are ofttimes opposed, and rightfully opposed, as mere joy-riding expeditions. Such is not the purpose of this resolution or the purpose of the committee in recommending it. Its number is limited to a very few. The appropriation is limited to a very small sum, and appointments will undoubtedly be made by the Vice President and the Speaker of Members who are earnestly desirous of doing something for the people of the islands.

According to one witness, the people would greatly welcome the visit of a commission to the islands. He stated that the people were approaching a condition of starvation. There is not work enough for men to support their families and they can not secure land upon which to raise products for a family's support.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WARREN:

A bill (S. 2875) to amend section 7 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1919; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. HARRIS:

A bill (S. 2876) for the relief of the heirs of Richard Reynolds, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 2877) granting a pension to Heber R. Davis (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HARRISON:

A bill (S. 2878) to carry into effect the findings of the Court of Claims in favor of Dora Alexander Miller and Emma Alexander, in her own right and as administratrix of estates of Jennie Alexander, deceased, and of Charles T. Alexander, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 2880) to amend section 260 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, as amended by section 6 of the act approved February 25, 1919"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. At the hearing before the Commerce Committee with reference to the merchant marine the chairman of the Shipping Board submitted the policy or recommendation of the policy adopted by the board with reference to the building up of the merchant marine. I requested him to prepare a bill in concrete form to carry out this policy. He has sent me a bill prepared for that purpose, which I desire to introduce and have referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (S. 2879) to authorize the operation or disposition of merchant vessels of the United States; to stimulate interstate and foreign commerce; to promote the welfare of seamen and navigators; to develop port, harbor, and terminal facilities; to encourage shipbuilding, marine insurance, and other agencies necessary to the development of the merchant marine of the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PULP-WOOD RESOURCES.

Mr. WATSON. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 93) providing for a survey of pulp-wood timber was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to have made by the Bureau of Forestry a survey of the resources of pulp-wood timber in the northeastern part of the United States, and to make recommendations for the methods of use, conservation, and replacement of same.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture also be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to make a preliminary investigation of the approximate and possible available pulp-wood supply in central and western United States, with recommendations for its utilization.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying out the above work.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, a statement having reference to the merits of the proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

CONSUMPTION AND PRODUCTION OF PULP WOOD.

Annual consumption of pulp wood and total cost for specified years.

Year.	Consumption, cords.	Total cost.
1918	5,250,794	$73,167,118
1917	5,480,075	60,815,057
1916	5,228,558	[1] 45,783,682
1914	4,470,763	39,408,453
1911	4,328,052	.....
1910	4,094,306	.....
1909	4,001,607	34,477,540
1908	3,346,953	28,047,473
1907	3,962,660	32,360,276
1906	3,661,176	26,411,887
1905	3,192,123	17,735,665
1899	1,986,310	9,837,516

[1] Not including cost of "slabs and other mill waste" in Louisiana, Massachusetts, North Carolina, and Virginia.

"In 1918 there were 250 establishments manufacturing wood pulp, and they used 5,250,794 cords of wood for this purpose. The price of this pulp wood shows an increase of more than 200 per cent. In 1899 the average cost per cord was $4.95, in 1909 it was $8.62, and in 1918 it was $13.93 per cord. In 1917 the average cost of pulp wood increased from the 1916 average of $8.76 to $11.10 per cord, or 27 per cent. In 1918 it increased to $13.93, or 25 per cent. The increase in 1918 over the 1917 price was 37 per cent in Maine, 24 per cent in New York, 13 per cent in Wisconsin, 38 per cent in Pennsylvania, 31 per cent in New Hampshire. In 1918, 76 per cent of the total output of wood pulp was manufactured in Maine, New York, Wisconsin, New Hampshire, and Pennsylvania.

PULP WOOD AND NEWSPRINT SITUATION.

"Two-thirds of the newsprint paper used by American newspapers is imported or is manufactured from wood or pulp imported from Canada. One-third is made in the United States from wood grown in the United States. The former proportion is steadily increasing, the latter is steadily decreasing.

"Nearly all of the American newsprint manufacturing industry is located in the Northeastern States—half of it in New York. Forests of wood suitable for pulp making are being exhausted in the Northeastern States. At the present rate of depletion but a negligible quantity will be left at the end of 10 or 20 years.

"But in the Pacific Northwest—Washington, Oregon, and part of California—and the inland empire of northwestern Montana and northern Idaho are great forests that have been no more than touched by the few pulp mills in that section of the country.

"And in Alaska are enormous areas of forests, the annual growth of which would supply pulp enough for half of the newsprint paper used in the United States, but there are no pulp mills there.

"Few pulp mills have been established in the Northwest, and none have been established in Alaska, in part because of the disadvantage in freight rates in reaching the eastern markets. The Panama Canal is believed to have removed much of the reason for this disadvantage; but other obstacles, such as the disinclination of business to pioneer in new fields, remain.

"Development of newsprint production in these regions is also retarded, it is believed, by the lack of authoritative knowledge of the extent and character of the available supplies of forest material, their location and accessibility, available water power, and the general situation which confronts the industry.

"The practice of forestry, which is now the only possible means of a permanent supply of domestic pulp wood in the East, it is believed, would be greatly stimulated by such a survey, which would develop in detail the seriousness of the situation.

"The sum of existing conditions is that American newspapers are becoming more and more dependent upon foreign sources for the raw material from which newsprint paper is made, the raw material is being exhausted in the section where the domestic industry is concentrated, and mills are moving from this country to Canada; while at the same time the United States contains forest resources in the Northwest and in Alaska that promise abundant supply for many years and indefinitely under proper conservation if the industry can be built up in these regions.

"A condition of dependence upon foreign supplies of newsprint carries with it serious possibilities not only for consumers of newsprint—chiefly our newspapers—but also for other business interests and the public generally. It would afford a dangerous opening for covert interference with the freedom of the press and with untrammeled development of business through advertising. That such a danger is not imaginary has been evidenced abroad.

"A permanent domestic newsprint industry is therefore a matter of public importance. Its maintenance is believed to be entirely practicable if the proper public action is taken.

"The Forest Service of the United States Department of Agriculture, to prevent American newspapers from becoming totally dependent upon a foreign supply, recommends:

"First. An adequate governmental survey of American resources in this field.

"Second. To bring about the practice of forestry and the conservation of forests in the pulp-producing regions, to the end that the annual inroads upon the forests will be lessened and eventually will be no more than equal to the annual growth. This part of the program would require Federal and State legislation.

"Third. The development of the pulp-making industry in the Northwest and in Alaska at the earliest practicable time.

"The following resolution was recently adopted at a meeting of the Canadian Forestry Association:

"Whereas an accurate survey of all standing timber in Canada, showing the various kinds of timber, the quality, location, and accessibility, together with available means of transporting same to the nearest market, also a report of all cut-over lands which are suitable only for forest growth, with the extent and location of same, would be most valuable information not only to timber operators but to the various Dominion and provincial governments, enabling them to develop to the full extent a permanent forest policy, which would have the effect of conserving the great natural resources contained in Canada's forests: Be it

"Resolved, That the Canadian Forestry Association urge upon the proper governmental authorities to provide adequate financial assistance and clothe the commission of conservation with the necessary authority for the purpose of accomplishing the end in view.

"Similar resolutions have been passed by many organizations in the United States.

"Mr. R. S. Kellogg, secretary of the Newsprint Service Bureau, in his report of February 11, 1919, has this to say:

"* * * No other method of wood utilization approaches that of pulp and paper manufacture in the completeness with which the raw material is used, and no one can set a limit to the number of articles of daily utility that it is possible to manufacture from pulp and paper. These articles will be manufactured in greater quantity and variety as our knowledge increases and as higher values of forest products lead to more scientific utilization of the timber supply. Pulp and paper manufacturing is the one great industry using wood as a raw material in which there is much hope for the practice of forestry as a commercial undertaking upon privately owned land. The production of large-size timber is too long an undertaking, with too great hazards and too low a rate of return, to attract the investor or to appeal to the practical sense of lumber manufacturers. On the other hand, the production of pulp wood of rapid growing species under good conditions is a matter of much shorter time than the growing of saw timber, and the amount of capital invested in a pulp and paper mill is so great as to require a long period of return. Hence it is to the pulp and paper industry that professional foresters of the country turn most hopefully for the practical application of their principles, and it is gratifying to note that a number of members of the bureau have upon their staffs excellently qualified foresters, and that in addition to protecting their timberlands from fire these companies are engaging in large-scale timber-planting operations for the definite purpose of providing a future supply of pulp wood for their mills.

"The importance of a survey of the timber available for pulp wood can not be overstated, for the reason that it is absolutely necessary to know just what we have, as all methods of replacement, conservation, and general questions in connection with the solution of this problem must be based upon the present available supply and the probable time it will last.

"There was consumed in the United States during the year 1918, 5,250,794 cords of pulp wood. If these cords were placed end to end they would reach entirely across the Continent of North America and nearly to the middle of the Pacific Ocean; one-third of this made from timber cut in the United States, enough to make one long cord of wood reaching from Boston to Liverpool.

"The demand for pulp wood is increasing and the supply is diminishing. The requirements of wood are so many that the time has come to have an accurate survey made of this great natural resource, with recommendations for its conservation and replacement. If the invention of the printing press was the greatest factor for civilization, it is certainly high time that we awake to the situation we are facing."

AMENDMENT OF FOOD-CONTROL ACT.

Mr. HARRISON. On yesterday the House amended the food-control act by providing penalties against profiteering. I desire to submit an amendment to that bill providing against profiteering in rents in the District of Columbia, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I submit an amendment to Senate bill 2775, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed. I desire to have the amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

On page 24, line 23, strike out section 25 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 25. That the Secretary of the Interior shall reserve and upon the direction of the President shall exercise the authority to cancel any prospecting permit or lease upon failure by the permittee to exercise due diligence in the prosecution of the prospecting or development work in accordance with the terms and conditions stated in the permit or lease or whenever, in the discretion of the President, such cancellation shall be in the public interest, and shall insert in every such permit or lease issued under the provisions of this act appropriate provisions for its cancellation. Each permit or lease shall also contain a specific provision authorizing the President, in his discretion, to take over and operate such permit or lease, paying just compensation to the owner for the use of tools, appliances, machinery, and products on hand, or, in his discretion, purchasing the same at the actual physical value of such personal property."

BONUS FOR SOLDIERS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I received on the 19th of August a letter from a soldier in the recent war, Pvt. Luke E. O'Toole, of 316 Fifteenth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., referring to the proposition to provide a bonus of $180 each for the Army of the United States as constituted under the draft law. I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 18, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senator from Colorado,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This letter is from one who saw service in the late war and who has a wife and two children dependent upon his weekly earnings, which amount to $25. I am one of the multitude of rent payers, have no income from any other source than my weekly salary, and feel, therefore, that principally for those reasons some consideration should be given to my views relative to your opposition to the "six months' bonus petition" which was recently presented to the Senate by Senator CALDER, of New York.

I enlisted in the Army because I was of the opinion that the Government had made adequate provision for the support of my dependents, and though I could have stayed home on their account, if I had so desired, I felt that, being a young man of 27 years and in excellent health, my place was serving my country in its time of need. I knew that in the event of my being disabled or killed my dependents would be taken care of, at least, until my children reached maturity, through the Government insurance.

I did my "bit" while in the service and was honorably discharged last December. The $60 bonus which the Government paid to me some time after my discharge was quite a help to me and my family at the time it was received; and it was appreciated. After being discharged I returned to my former occupation and am now supporting four on the $25 per week which I now receive.

I am not writing this seeking praise or commendation, for I do not deserve any. I am content with the knowledge that I have served my country in its time of need, and the only reward I wish for is that when my children grow older they may feel justly proud of the fact that when their country called their father responded.

You will admit that I, if anyone, ought to welcome the payment of the "six months' bonus," but I conscientiously feel that it would be very unreasonable on my part to expect it of the Government; more so because of the Government's intention to assist those who desire to secure a place in the country, which will in time be beneficial not only to those taking advantage of the opportunity but to the whole country in general.

I heartily approve of the stand you have taken in regard to the "six months' bonus petition" and indorse your reasons for objecting to same as stated in your letter of August 12 to Henry F. McCann, of New York City, and the majority of right-thinking ex-service men will also agree with your views on the subject, you will find.

It is not the industrious, everyday worker, intent upon earning his livelihood, who is advocating the "six months' bonus"; nor is it, on the whole, those who served their country when the need arose who are clamoring for this unjust payment. It is the cheap office seeker, the petty officeholder who can not win votes on his merits, the agitator who plays upon the money need of the shiftless ex-service man, and last, but not least, the notorious "yellow press." This applies not only to the "six months' bonus petition," but to all such movements which have for their object the dispensing of charity by the Government to all able-bodied men who were not disabled in the great conflict.

It is the Government's duty to take ample care of those who were disabled and the dependents of those who made the supreme sacrifice in this war, but it is not the duty of the Government to maintain a charitable institution for those who are able to work and earn a livelihood.

If the truth was known this monster petition was not signed by a majority of the ex-service men, nor by a large minority either, but by those people who thoughtlessly imagined that this enormous amount of money would not come out of their own pockets, but would be paid by "the Government," being ignorant of the fact just who constituted "the Government," evidently not realizing that "the Government" must secure its funds, either directly or indirectly, from them.

Neither I, nor did any of my relatives, sign this petition. It, as everyone in New York City knows, was originally conceived by a certain New York daily, noted for its frequent appeals to the emotions and passions of the class of readers who, on the whole, make up its medium of circulation. This same newspaper was more pro-German in its utterances before this country entered the war than most of the German-language press; it maintained an underlying sarcastic attitude while this country was engaged in the conflict, and since the termination of the war has adopted a "playing-to-the-gallery" policy toward the men returning home.

This newspaper has never fostered a public movement which has received the support of the better-thinking class of news readers in New York City.

In closing, permit me to add that I trust enough Members of the Senate and House will be found who will make it their duty to stifle this bonus petition and all similar bills which have for their object the dispensing of charity to those not entitled thereto. If the passage of these sort of bills was left to a referendum vote of the ex-service men an overwhelming majority would be found in opposition to them.

Trusting I have not occupied too much of your valuable time and begging to be excused for the use of pencil, I am, sir,

Very sincerely, yours,

LUKE E. O'TOOLE,
316 Fifteenth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

STRIKE OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have also received a circular issued by the railway employees' department and dated Washington, D. C., August 5, 1919, addressed to the officers and members of certain railroad locals, outlining plans and methods to be followed in the strike which materialized in some degree on or about the 5th of August. This is so important, in my judgment at least, and so timely, in view of possible future troubles of the same sort, that I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary may read it from the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES' DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., August 5, 1919.

To the officers and members of the railroad locals of the International Association of Machinists; International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers; International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers, Iron Ship Builders, and Helpers; Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers' International Alliance; International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Brotherhood Railway Carmen of America, under control of the Railroad Administration and the Canadian War Board—greetings:

It is expected that the strike vote now before our membership will carry, thereby authorizing your officers to call a strike of the shopmen of all trades in the event a satisfactory adjustment of our demands are not conceded, and if it comes to that point it behooves all to be prepared to handle the situation in a businesslike way, and to the end that this will be done this letter of instructions is issued for your guidance.

First, you must recognize that the Railway Employees' Department and no one else is the official head of the movement, and to them and their subordinate parts alone you must look for advice and guidance. Unauthorized organizations, such as the so-called Chicago Council of Federated Shopmen, should be ignored entirely. They are responsible to no one, and their leaders, some of whom are questionable characters, are answerable to no one.

Keep in mind that in all movements of this kind there are forces at work to divide the workers amongst themselves, and organizations seeking to work independently of the Railway Employees' Department of the American Federation of Labor should be looked upon with suspicion.

If a strike is called the proper committees must be ready to assume their duties. There are three important committees, namely, picket service, finance, and publicity.

It is assumed that upon every railroad where a system federation exists you have an advisory board, elected in conformity with section 13 of the subordinate system federation constitution. This section provides for an advisory board not to exceed five members from each organization. We recommend that from this advisory board an executive committee not to exceed one man from each draft be elected to have direct supervision and be responsible for the work of the various committees.

Those in charge of picket service should be intrusted with the work of seeing that efficient picket duty is performed continuously and that this work is equally divided amongst all trades. Local conditions should be considered in determining the length of each tour of duty of the pickets.

PUBLICITY—LOCAL AID TO THE RAILWAY EMPLOYEES' DEPARTMENT.

The above is an important part of the conduct of a strike and should receive the most careful attention. Past experience has taught us that in order to keep our members encouraged and working properly it is absolutely necessary to maintain a close line of communication between the members on each system, as well as the headquarters.

We want to warn you against subscribing to or indorsing unauthorized publications purporting to speak for the strikers. There should be but one official bulletin recognized upon each system to disseminate the strike news as often as deemed necessary.

We would also recommend that the division officers establish a bulletin to distribute the news to their division members. The Railway Department should be furnished with copies of all bulletins issued either by system federations or divisions, and the department will issue a bulletin weekly giving the situation as it exists throughout the entire United States and Canada.

At points where there is no advisory board, one man should be designated as the correspondent, and he should report direct to the system publicity committee. The department will not recognize communications coming from anyone except the regular authorized correspondents.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.

The matter of finances is of vital importance to the proper conduct of any strike, and we recommend that every man employed on the railroads immediately contribute one full day's pay to the funds of the local federation, none of this to be returnable to the grand lodges, but to remain as a working fund for the local federation.

Too much care can not be exercised as to who is intrusted with the handling of local funds after they have been secured, as well as the manner of procuring them. Experience has taught us that during strikes very often funds are injudiciously handled, especially in the early stages of the strike. Some men are inclined to take advantage of local officers who often do not exercise care in guarding the funds that they should. The local executive committee should have supervision of the raising of funds, and no one should be permitted to inaugurate a movement to secure funds except upon the approval of the executive committee, and no general appeal will be authorized except after being approved by the president of the Railway Employees' Department. A complete statement of the amount of money procured from any source whatever by local systems or divisions should be furnished to the secretary-treasurer of the Railway Employees' Department.

On roads where crafts maintain general chairmen they will be considered the official of the crafts on those systems. On roads where no general chairman is maintained we suggest that some one be immediately designated as the official head of the system with whom we can transact business.

These instructions are laid down for your guidance, and we trust that you will take them as a basis to guide you in organizing your forces. To some it may seem that we are going into elaborate and unnecessary preparations, and to those we desire to say that with one or two exceptions we have always entered into strikes unprepared to handle the business, and the success of all movements depends largely upon preparation, and the better we are prepared and the more energetically the strike is handled the quicker our demands will be met. If it comes to a strike we want to make the tie-up complete and keep it in that condition until we get the proper recognition from those who can give it to us. Our success depends entirely upon how we can stop the transportation service of this country.

It is to be regretted that it is necessary to make such plans, but every honorable means have been exhausted in our effort to bring about a settlement without resorting to drastic measures. So if it comes to a strike we must make it the most effective one in the history of this country.

Urging you to adopt the suggestions made, and assuring you of our intense interest, we are,

Fraternally, yours.

Actg. Pres. Ry. E. Dept., A. F. of L.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to say, in comment upon this remarkable document, that it is a perfectly legitimate development of the action of Congress in 1914 in exempting organizations of men from the operation of the antitrust law.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I request the insertion in the RECORD of a portion of an article published in the Boston Evening Record of August 14, 1919.

In my opinion the letter of Mr. Hunneman in this news article deals with a very important factor in the cost of living, namely, the reckless exportation at the present time of food supplies, clothing, and other necessities of life with the controlling motive of money making by the exporter, when the controlling motive should be the relieving of distressed conditions in America due to the high cost of living.

I believe our people are entitled to have some vigorous and effective control over the exportation of the above-mentioned commodities, and that this control should be exercised at once.

As I am of the opinion that the article contains much information of value and importance on this subject which is of such widespread interest at the present time, therefore I ask that it be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WAY TO REDUCE THE COST OF LIVING.

[From the Boston Evening Record, Aug. 14, 1919.]

["The citizens of every country have the first right to the consumption of what they produce and to the production of what they consume."]

To the EDITOR:

The following is an open letter to the United States Attorney General, Hon. A. Mitchell Palmer:

"DEAR SIR: In a press report of July 31 you are quoted as inviting suggestions for reducing the cost of living, and I want to submit one.

"It is that the United States place foreign countries on rations so far as the export of our products is concerned. So long as exports are allowed to go on under the sole control of money-making influences, products that are needed by all in this country will be shipped abroad for as much profit as can be obtained, either to provide for necessities in foreign countries or to be wasted in those countries. By waste I mean to include all forms of unnecessary or extravagant use of the products of American labor.

"The American people willingly and cheerfully submitted to a restriction on the consumption of food supplies, clothing, and other necessities during the war in order to defeat the enemy. Now that that object has been accomplished, and we face as great, if not a greater, scarcity and need of the necessities of life, the only right way and safe way is to place all foreign countries on rations of American products of all kinds, especially certain staple products.

"The necessity for this policy is so evident that it is not necessary to dwell on this point. You will find it being practiced now by Great Britain in the distribution of the British wool supply, which is practically the world's supply of that article. At the second series of London wool sales, which open in a few weeks, buyers from the entente countries, the United States, and neutral countries will be allowed to purchase under a rationing system fixed by the British Government. This is altogether right, a measure of safety and self-defense, and a practical example for the United States to follow in respect to the export of our products.

"Unless our exports are restricted, the reduction in the cost of living by purely domestic measures will present difficulties that may prove insuperable, and which may easily threaten the stability of our Government.

"I have pointed out to you what is the foundation of any successful scheme for reducing the cost of living in the United States. It is probably unnecessary for me to remind you that the execution of this plan will bring the administration into conflict with the most powerful financial forces in the country as represented by merchants and exporters, and last but not least, bankers.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. GERRY, at his own request, was relieved from further service on the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. PHELAN, at the request of Mr. GERRY, was relieved from further service on the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. GERRY, it was Ordered, That the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] be assigned to the Committee on Immigration and that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] be assigned to the Committee on Pensions.

THE BOTANIC GARDEN.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, there is on the table Senate resolution 165, affecting the acquisition of a site for the Botanic Garden. I ask that it be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on the Library; and in the same connection I ask that the report of the Fine Arts Commission on the subject be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Library, to accompany the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

REPORT OF FINE ARTS COMMISSION.

"BOTANIC GARDEN.

"By act of Congress the memorial to Gen. Grant was located within the area now occupied by the Botanic Garden. The purpose of such location was to restore this area to the uses intended for it in the original plan of Washington. This space was set apart as a 'public walk, being a square of 1,200 feet, through which carriages may ascend to the upper square of the "Federal House" (Capitol).'

"The area now occupied by the Botanic Garden was granted in 1820 to the Columbian Institution for the Promotion of Arts and Sciences. At that time no attempt had been made to develop the Mall as a park connection between the Capitol and the White House, as was originally intended. The plan of 1901 proposes a restoration of this space to the uses first contemplated, and the location of the Grant Memorial was the first step in this direction. In order to carry out the purpose contemplated by Congress, the removal and relocation of the Botanic Garden becomes necessary.

"On August 16, 1916, the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives requested the commission to furnish data 'with reference to the effect on the general plan for the development of the Mall and the ground around the Grant Monument of the bill recently passed by the Senate to continue the Botanic Garden on its present site.' The bill adverted to (S. 6227, 64th Cong., 1st sess.) provided for the enlargement of the Botanic Garden by attaching thereto two parcels of land to the west, commonly known as East Seaton Park and West Seaton Park. The commission reported adversely on November 28, 1916.

"On January 27, 1917, the chairman of the same committee asked for 'a comprehensive report as to what the Commission of Fine Arts regard to be the best solution of the Botanic Garden problem, including a review of the sites available for the Botanic Garden itself; and what area in the vicinity of the Capitol may be had at a minimum or no expense for a Capitol flower garden, together with such facts and figures as will assist the committee in its consideration of this subject.' The report made was accompanied by an appendix covering in detail the various matters adverted to in the main body of the text. The report of the commission follows:

"In your letter of January 27 last you ask the Commission of Fine Arts for comprehensive report on the Botanic Garden problem. You call for a discussion of sites within the District of Columbia available for the Botanic Garden itself, and ask what area in the vicinity of the Capitol may be had for a Congress flower garden, together with such facts and figures as will assist your committee in its consideration of this subject. The commission herewith places before you the information desired by you.

"STATEMENT OF THE PROBLEM.

"For reasons that will appear, the Botanic Garden must be removed from its present location. Congress, when it located the Grant Memorial in the garden area, forced the garden out. Such was the intention of Congress. The action was entirely logical. That space was designed by President Washington and Maj. L'Enfant as an open approach to the Capitol, and is so shown on the original plan of the city. It was proposed at that time that this area should be subject to ornamentation with memorials, fountains, and the like, but not shut off by walls and fences. Locating the Botanic Garden in this area was one of those serious mistakes made in the early part of the century whereby the great plan for the Nation's Capital suffered damage that has continued to this day. The location of the Grant Memorial was the first step toward repairing this damage. The subsequent location of the Meade Memorial in the same area is a further advance in the restoration of the original plan.

"In furtherance of its purpose to restore the Mall to its original status as a park connection between the legislative and executive departments, Congress paid the Pennsylvania Railroad $1,500,000 to remove its tracks from the Mall. The public plaza or square on the west front of the Capitol Grounds is a feature of this large plan. The New National Museum Building, the Agricultural Department buildings, and the gallery for the Freer collections all have been located with reference to the general plan. Slowly, but steadily, changes in conformity with that plan are now being carried out throughout the entire 2½ miles from the Capitol Grounds to the Lincoln Memorial. The removal of the Botanic Garden is essential to the development of the great composition.

"If Congress desires to continue a garden for the purpose of obtaining flowers for its Members and for growing shrubs to disseminate throughout the country, both of these purposes can be subserved quite as well by glasshouses and gardens in other accessible locations.

"The proposition to extend the present garden into the Mall to the west of its present location would be the perpetuation of an unfortunate condition of affairs which Congress has taken steps to end. Such an extension means continued confusion. To-day in a fenced-in area of less than 12 acres there are, first, the memorial to Gen. Grant, the base of which is arranged as a reviewing stand, and therefore requires an open space; second, the very large Bartholdi fountain; and, third, large greenhouses with shining high glass roofs, dominating and disturbing the appearance of both fountain and monument. In addition, a residence for the superintendent and other like buildings are found in this inclosure. To all these will shortly be added the large memorial to Gen. Meade, contributed by the State of Pennsylvania. This array of incongruous structures is absurd, confusing, and wholly impossible for a permanent establishment.

"Congress may readily bring order out of the present chaos by the removal of the iron fence and opening the entire area to the public by removing the glass houses and superintendent's quarters to a new location and by transferring the fountain to another section of the District.

"BRIEF HISTORY OF THE GARDEN.

"The establishment of the present Botanic Garden and its relation to the Joint Committee on the Library was the outgrowth of the Wilkes exploring expedition of 1838–1842, although there had been a Botanic Garden on this site for nearly two decades under congressional permission granted the Columbian Institute for the Promotion of Arts and Sciences, then extinct. The supposition is tenable that the primary reason for locating here was that there were still in existence some traces of the former garden. (The charter of the Columbian Institute established for the promotion of arts and sciences, approved by the President in 1820, was as follows:)

"Be it enacted, etc., * * * That there be granted, during the pleasure of Congress, to the Columbian Institute for the Promotion of Arts and Sciences, the use and improvement of a tract of public land in the city of Washington, not exceeding 5 acres, to be located under the direction of the President of the United States, for the purpose of enabling the said Columbian Institute to effect the object of their incorporation: Provided, That whenever the said institute shall be dissolved, or cease to exist, or to employ the said tract of land for the purpose aforesaid, all right, title, and interest hereby granted to the same shall revert to and vest in the United States as completely as if such grant had never been made. (16th Cong., 1st sess. From Private Statutes at Large, U. S. A., 1789–1845, vol. 6.)

"Adverting to this institute and its connection with the then Botanic Garden, Richard Rathbun, assistant secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, in his monograph on the Columbian Institute for the Promotion of Arts and Sciences (Smithsonian Institution Bulletin 101, 1917) says: '* * * Ceasing to exist as an active organization in 1837, the fact that it had established and maintained a botanic garden for nearly two decades seems almost immediately to have been forgotten, and the selection of the identical tract for the United States Botanic Garden 13 years later would therefore appear, so far as shown by any of the records now available, to have had no relation to its former occupation by the Columbian Institute.'

"The naval appropriation act of May 14, 1836, authorized the President to send a surveying and exploring expedition to the Pacific Ocean and the South Seas in Government vessels.

"Congress granted $100,000 and authorized the use of any other moneys in the control of the Navy Department, not exceeding an expenditure of $150,000. After numerous delays the expedition, consisting of six Government ships under Lieut. Charles Wilkes, United States Navy, sailed from Hampton Roads August 18, 1838. The expedition returned to New York June 10, 1842, bringing a large collection of natural-history specimens.

"On August 26, 1842, the Committee on the Library requested Lieut. Wilkes to prepare a narrative of his voyage, and appointed the naturalist of the expedition 'to arrange and class the various objects of natural history,' later appropriating $20,000 for this purpose. The horticulturist and assistant botanist of the expedition was charged with the duty of preserving the horticultural and botanical specimens. (Up to 1852 sums amounting in all to $158,753 were appropriated for the salary of the scientific corps, caring for the collection and for preparing and publishing the works on the expedition. From 1844 to 1875 a series of appropriations for greenhouse and garden construction amounting to about $114,861 additional.) These objects were for a time on exhibition in that portion of the Patent Office Building then constructed and in greenhouses in the square behind the building, but upon extension of the Patent Office Building, begun in 1849, were in 1850 removed to the present area. (For a detailed account of the beginnings of the Botanic Garden on this site see Bulletin 101 of Smithsonian Institution, by Richard Rathbun, assistant secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, in charge of United States National Museum.)

"In May, 1850, Congress appropriated $5,000 for a new greenhouse and the removal thereto of the plants of the exploring expedition, and during the same month the present site, upon which the new greenhouse was built, was selected by the Joint Committee on the Library. This ground was thereafter commonly known as the "Botanic Garden," but the term was not officially applied to the location until August 18, 1856, when its maintenance was specifically placed under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library.

"From 1851 to the present time approximately $387,977 has been appropriated for repairs and equipment of buildings and grounds. From 1857 to the present time there has been appropriated for trees, seeds, fertilizer, and so forth, approximately $228,550, and for salaries and labor from 1843 to 1916 approximately $426,607 more. Expense of lighting is included in that of the Capitol from 1876 to the present time. The total expenditures on the garden from about 1842 to 1917, including the original appropriation for the expedition, amounts to about $1,416,748. The present structures and equipment are antiquated and inadequate for a real botanic garden. Most of that which has value can be removed.

"THE NEED OF A REAL BOTANIC GARDEN.

"When comparison is made with the gardens of other cities and countries, the fact is disclosed that the United States Government has no real botanic garden in Washington. The present so-called Botanic Garden does not compare favorably even with gardens established in other cities in this country. The name is a misnomer. A national botanic garden in Washington was conceived in the early days of the century by broad-minded and far-seeing men. It was begun by the employment of Government vessels and a large appropriation for those days. The work was handled by a body of scientists. This garden, so wisely and adequately begun, now serves mainly as a distributer of plants and flowers.

"The present area of the entire establishment devoted to both Botanic Garden display and propagating purposes for congressional use is 12.47 acres. Of this 11.31 acres are included in the fenced area and 1.16 lie south of Maryland Avenue. Of the section lying south of Maryland Avenue a number of stables covering 0.10 acre is used for other purposes and need not be included. Of the area within the inclosure 1.15 acres only are covered by palm houses and other structures, while the remainder of 10.16 acres is used for outdoor display. This latter area has been diminished considerably by the location of the Grant Memorial, and when the construction of the Meade Memorial is begun the available space will be still further decreased.

"The famous Royal Botanic Gardens of Kew, formerly of 253 acres, of which 178 were in the arboretum and 75 in gardens devoted to economic and taxonomic work, had been increased to 288 acres in 1908. The 24 colonial botanical gardens of the British Empire are closely associated and identified with Kew. These associated gardens have opened up new industries in the British colonies, thus creating an increased demand for capital and labor; have introduced quinine, cocoa, and rubber from South American countries to colonies where it was theretofore unknown in culture, and tea into South Africa, where it had not been previously grown; and in many other ways have repaid a thousandfold by vastly increasing the trade of the Empire. This work became so pronounced as to have interested the German Empire to such an extent that Bismarck paid a special visit to Kew to ascertain just what influence this garden was having on the commerce of the British Empire. In this country economic work is done by the Agricultural Department, from whose activities those of a botanic garden should be distinctly separated.

"Berlin has 1,325 acres in its botanic garden, which was established at a cost of $4,000,000. Paris has 75 acres, Edinburgh has 58 acres, Glasgow 40 acres, Petrograd 54 acres, and Rio de Janeiro has 2,000 acres. In the appendix will be found descriptions of botanic gardens in various parts of the world. These gardens are all a source of pleasure as well as of profit to the nations in which they are located. Harvard University has given to the city of Boston the 220 acres comprised in the Arnold Arboretum, the maintenance of the roads being paid by the city and the teaching facilities being retained by the university. St. Louis has 80 acres in its Shaw Gardens. New York has 400 acres. Pittsburgh and some other cities have botanic gardens in connection with their park system.

"REMOVAL OF THE PRESENT GARDEN WILL BENEFIT THE PUBLIC.

"The removal of the Botanic Garden by no means implies that the public which now enjoys the present garden is to be left without such enjoyment in the immediate neighborhood of the Capitol. The enlargement of the Capitol Grounds on the north affords an area for gardens of great beauty and distinction, through which will pass all visitors to Washington and a large proportion of those persons who daily go to the Capitol and the Library of Congress. The present Botanic Garden is seen by an insignificant fraction of vistors or residents. The contemplated Congress gardens will be a feature of the city and will take their place among the means of daily enjoyment by all who approach Capitol Hill. The removal of the garden features from the west side of the Capitol to the north side simply makes such features more available than they now are.

"ALTERNATIVE SITE FOR TEMPORARY RELOCATION OF GARDEN.

"If Congress desires to find a temporary location to accommodate the propagating structures and equipment lying within the fenced-in inclosure, comprising the palm house, the superintendent's quarters, and some glasshouses, which in themselves cover an area of about 1.15 acres, there is available for their accommodation an old canal space, Government-owned, of about 2.72 acres at Second Street and New Jersey Avenue, between M and N Streets SE. The space immediately adjoining it on the north at Second Street between M and L Streets, of about 0.79 acre, is also available. Thus an area double the size of that now in use is available without land cost.

"A REAL BOTANIC GARDEN.

"The problem is only half solved when provision is made for flowers for Members of Congress and for the present limited output of shrubs and cuttings. There is a demand for a real botanic garden, in which the public may examine living specimens of the enormous varieties of trees, shrubs, vines, and herbaceous plants native to this locality or capable of being grown here, freely, out of doors. These plants should be classified, and the public should be made free of the grounds for recreation and study. The people not only get direct enjoyment, but also they benefit by reason of the help in making selection of trees, shrubs, and other plants for home grounds and for street planting.

"A large area is required to grow well-developed specimens of the different kinds of trees which are native to the District alone, to say nothing of showing the very different aspects of those trees when grouped as in a wood and when grown singly as lawn or street trees. The great numbers of native shrubs, the equally important and interesting trees and shrubs which have been introduced and will be introduced from all over the world, requires an outlying area running into some hundreds of acres. It presents a wholly different problem from that of a place limited primarily to the exhibition of garden flowers in the usual sense of the term. It calls not only for a large tract of land, but for one of diversified soil and varied exposure. (Dr. N. S. Britton, of the New York Botanic Garden, very aptly terms botanic gardens museums of living plants, which are treated as museum objects, labeled and installed to illustrate not only the objects themselves but their relation to other objects; highly specialized parks, which are immediate factors in public education, imparting visual information in a positive and direct manner while serving as places of public recreation.)

"SITES FOR AN ADEQUATE BOTANIC GARDEN.

"An exhaustive search has been made of areas available for garden purposes in the District of Columbia. The commission has sought a location on which a botanic garden might be established, with such area and such diversity of soils as would enable it to take rank as a great institution. Examinations were made of tracts at Rock Creek Park, Brightwood, Foundry Branch, Mount Hamilton, on the eastern side of the Anacostia River, and in Virginia.

"Rock Creek Park.—Of the sites suggested, the one at the head of Rock Creek Park is given first consideration, because it has frequently been mentioned as available at no cost for land.

"The entire park comprises 1,606 acres, most of which is in steep wooded hillsides.

"If Rock Creek Park shall be given up as a park and used solely for a national botanic garden and arboretum, much can be said in favor of this area, in spite of the predominance of excessively steep slopes. There are scattered areas of moderate slopes on the uplands and strips of level land subject to overflow in the bottom of the valley. There is a considerable variety of soils and exposures, and if every piece of land in the park physically adaptable to botanic garden purposes were to be regarded as available for such use, the total area would be ample. It is a serious practical objection, however, that the most available areas are so scattered and so separated from each other by deep ravines and steep hills as to make the layout and administration of a great botanic garden and arboretum on this site inconvenient, and in the long run unduly costly.

"Again, it is not possible to disregard the value of the land for other purposes. Congress did not authorize the acquirement of Rock Creek Park simply in pursuance of a general theory that a growing Capital City ought to have a large general reserve of land available for public recreation and for kindred uses, to be "improved" and made available from time to time as the need for various specific uses might become apparent.

"The land was bought because the valley of Rock Creek within the District of Columbia had certain peculiar and extraordinary characteristics which gave it a special value for one particular purpose, a value unattainable elsewhere, a value which would be destroyed if Congress did not act to preserve it, a value which if faithfully preserved would give incalculable enjoyment and healthful recreation to the people of the District in future generations. This special value was and is dependent on the peculiar beauty of the natural scenery of Rock Creek Valley.

"This is not the place to attempt any analysis of that beauty, but clearly it has its own distinctive qualities—very precious, very easily destroyed. It was primarily those qualities which justified the acquirement of the park, and nothing ought to be permitted within its borders that will tend to subordinate or sacrifice them.

"The character of the native vegetation is one of the important factors in making this scenery what it is. In places the woods had been cleared before the park was acquired, the location of these clearings being wholly accidental as far as concerns their effect on the landscape. Some of these openings, left as simple green fields, are an advantage to the scenery. Others might better be restored in time to a woodland condition, but that woodland should be absolutely harmonious with the native forest.

"If the attempt shall be made to create an arboretum here, even without the glittering glasshouses and formal beds of a complete botanic garden, conflicts of purpose are certain to arise which will defeat in a measure the original purpose of Rock Creek Park. It is essential in any arboretum or botanical park worthy of the name to introduce many plants which not only are not native of the locality but which produce effects radically different from those which make the Rock Creek scenery what it it.

"The danger is strikingly illustrated for anyone who has an appreciation of the qualities of natural landscape by the planting which has actually been done on certain open lands in Rock Creek Park with the purpose of creating an arboretum. This planting, it is understood, was done by the Forestry Service under permission from the Board of Control of Rock Creek Park. It can be seen near Camp Good Will. It does not now, and it never will, look like a part of the natural scenery. It is distinctly out of harmony with it. The sort of thing that has here been done on an open field is liable to be done almost anywhere in the park if the purpose of creating a varied botanical collection is placed side by side with that of preserving the natural scenery as one of the prime objects of the park.

"A national botanic garden, arboretum, or botanical park worthy of the United States Government can never be created unless those in charge are enthusiastically devoted to its special purposes and ready to serve those purposes at the expense of the peculiarities of the local natural scenery whenever the two purposes unavoidably conflict. If the botanic garden is established in Rock Creek Park, the inevitable result will be the gradual frittering away of a priceless and self-consistent piece of natural scenery.

"It is not necessary to express an opinion as to whether the purposes of a national botanic garden are more or less important than those for which Rock Creek was acquired. The point is that both purposes can not dominate the management of one piece of ground without conflict, and this piece of ground was set apart by Congress for the preservation of its natural scenery. If the original intention of Congress in this instance is to be observed, the introduction of such a foreign element as a botanic garden is too dangerous to be ventured. Therefore, the use of Rock Creek Park for this purpose can not be recommended.

"The Mount Hamilton site.—The Mount Hamilton site is situated between the Bladensburg Road and the new Anacostia reclamation project, just south of the National Training School for Boys. The larger hill itself is shown on the park plan of 1901 as a desirable addition to the park system. It is now privately owned. It has three round-top peaks immediately adjacent to the Bladensburg Road which in themselves cover about 80 acres; nearly all wooded, mostly with oaks in good condition. The eastern slope of the hill has an outcrop of yellow sand which supports a vigorous growth of pine. The hill itself is of a heavier gravel soil. Immediately north of this hill there is a comparatively level area extending to Hickey Road, which is of rich farming soil. Connecting these two areas with the National Training School for Boys is another small hill, densely wooded, whose precipitous sides drop abruptly to the bank of the Anacostia River.

"The tract fronts on the Anacostia River for a distance of about 9,000 feet, and carries a large variety of soils in such condition that very little preparation for the uses of a botanic garden would be needed. Little grading other than that required for roads is required. It has north, south, east, and west slopes, and the level area between the hill and Hickey Road would work out well for greenhouses and herbaceous gardens, while the other areas would be ideal for shrub and small flowering-tree arboretum uses, especially as the northern and southeastern slopes of the hill form two amphitheaters which would display such exhibits on a large scale. An examination of the soil has been made by the Department of Agriculture, and its report may be found in the appendix. Briefly summarized, the investigation by that department indicates that it will be possible to grow plants of even the most exacting soil requirements, the diverse types of soil affording almost every variation which can be secured in this section of the country. According to this report practically any plant which can thrive in this climate can be grown in this area.

"The whole area contains about 483 acres. About 83 acres of it is to be acquired for the Anacostia Park reclamation, so that only about 400 acres need to be considered for purchase in connection with this project. It is on the main highway line between Baltimore and Washington. The Lincoln Highway, with little difficulty, could be brought along the shores of the Anacostia Park and thence by way of Maryland avenue to the Capitol Building, affording an entrance to Washington of unequaled beauty. As to accessibility, there is already an electric car line along the Bladensburg Road, and the junction of the Pennsylvania and Baltimore & Ohio Railroads is only about 2,000 feet away, while the Pennsylvania Railroad is about 800 feet from the excellent possible sites for the greenhouses and the herbaceous garden.

"For extension of the gardens the Anacostia Park is available. That portion of the park between the Pennsylvania Railroad and Benning Bridge contains about 503 acres, lowland and water, thus furnishing ample opportunity for expansion on land not subject to overflow for lowland and fresh-water exhibits.

"If in the future there should be added to this area that portion of the Anacostia Park between Benning Bridge and the Pennsylvania Bridge, there would be an addition of another 398 acres, including land and water, which could be used in connection with the proposed garden. This extension into the Anacostia Water Park would afford unlimited opportunity for beautiful aquatic gardens, with all the possibilities this implies.

"It will thus be seen that by extension into the Anacostia Park this undertaking that has been begun purely as a necessary sanitary measure can be made to so serve the Nation doubly, thus paying large dividends on the capital invested. At the assessor's valuation, according to the latest available data, the cost of the 400 acres in this tract would amount to $221,468, which is at the rate of $553.67 per acre.

"In point of physical availability, excellence of exposure, accessibility, distribution of essential parts, and capacity for enlargement without increase of cost after the initial purchase the Mount Hamilton location stands out preeminent among all the sites that have been examined. Here both the Botanic Garden and the Congress Propagating Gardens can be adequately accommodated permanently without conflicting in any way with the city's development. On the contrary, they could contribute their important share harmoniously and effectively to the upbuilding of the Nation's Capital.

"The Mount Hamilton tract, by reason of its location and topography, has been recommended in the plans for the development of the city as desirable in any event for park purposes and ultimately should be acquired. It affords vistas over the city comparable with those from the famous Pincian Hill over the city of Rome. Should Congress decide to retain the Congress Gardens in the vicinity of the Capitol, the Botanic Garden and arboretum ought in any case to be established at Mount Hamilton.

"SUMMARY OF COSTS.

"Comparative valuation of the three principal sites suggested for use as a botanic garden.

Location.	Acres.	Assessor's valuation.	Average cost per acre.	Remarks.
Mount Hamilton, northeast.	400	$221,468.00	$553.67	Reached by the Bladensburg electric line. Joins Anacostia River development, and has eastern, western, southern, and northern exposures. Can expand into Anacostia Park to produce garden of over 1,400 acres.
Brightwood, northeast.	312	185,885.00	595.00	Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, Metropolitan Branch. Has all exposures. Can not expand in the future except at cost of additional purchase.
Foundry Branch, northeast.	189	197,912.00	1,047.00	Wisconsin Avenue electrics. East, west, and south exposures. Can not expand in the future except at a cost of additional purchase.

"RECOMMENDATIONS.

"The Commission of Fine Arts recommends:

"First, that the Mount Hamilton tract be acquired for a national botanic garden and arboretum. By purchasing 400 acres of land, at least 800 acres of Government-owned lands will be made available. Also a park entrance to the city from the north will be provided.

"Second, that the public features of the present Botanic Garden be transferred from the west side of the Capitol to the north side and to lands already owned by the Government.

Also that the propagating gardens be accommodated temporarily on the James Creek Canal spaces owned by the Government, which spaces are of double the extent of the area now in use. Ultimately those features should become part of the new botanic garden."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 8536. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

H. R. 8624. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

DROUGHT SUFFERERS IN MONTANA.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In accordance with the notice I gave on yesterday, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 87.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is this a resolution coming over from yesterday?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it is a joint resolution that went to the calendar yesterday. It is Calendar No. 136.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then it will require unanimous consent to take it up. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that the title of the joint resolution be read.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 87) authorizing the President to distribute food supplies to drought-stricken territory.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say just a word in relation to this legislation.

I think that passing this joint resolution is a very serious thing. Another very serious precedent will be established. In my opinion, the better way to do in cases of this kind is for the States themselves to take care of conditions brought about by drought, frost, or other conditions over which the people have no control.

For four years the fruit crop in the main fruit district of the State of Utah was virtually a failure on account of frost. I know that when the Uintah Indian Reservation was opened and the people were asked to homestead land upon the payment of $1.25 an acre within a five-year period I had an exceedingly hard time in securing the passage through Congress of a bill extending the time for the payment for those lands. The reason for the request was total loss of crops on account of frost. At the same time the Legislature of the State of Utah appropriated money for the purpose of buying seed wheat for the purpose of lending assistance to the people who had settled upon those lands. I doubt if many of them could have continued living upon the lands unless the State had adopted that policy.

This joint resolution is so broad that if there is a partial loss of crop aid is to be extended to the parties so affected. I do not care what year it may be, there never will be a time in the history of this country when some section of the West will not lose a part of its crop; or, in other words, I mean that the crop will not be up to standard. Perhaps it may not be on account of drought; it may be on account of too much water; it may be on account of hail; it may be on account of frost; and it seems to me that if we are going to enter upon this class of legislation there will be no end to it. As far as I am concerned, if we undertake to take care of the people enumerated in this joint resolution, why should we not take care of the poor and unfortunate in all parts of the country?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, that is just the question I was going to ask the Senator. When distress comes this winter in the cities, as it will, are we going to extend this principle? It may be that we should; I do not know; but we are certainly setting a precedent that will have a far-reaching influence.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly what I am calling attention to, I will say to the Senator from Iowa. In my opinion it is dangerous. I know that it is not very popular for a Senator to stand upon the floor of this Chamber and say that the Government of the United States should not assist people who are in distress.

Mr. KENYON. In view of the fact, however, that we voted $100,000,000 to send food abroad, or to keep food there for the distressed people of Europe, how can we well refuse to take care of our people at home?

Mr. SMOOT. The $100,000,000 was supposed to be returned to the United States. This resolution provides a gift.

Mr. KENYON. How much of it has been returned? Does the Senator know how the $100,000,000 has been spent?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; and no other Senator knows.

Mr. SUTHERLAND and Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Chair.

Mr. SMOOT. But I did make the statement upon the floor of the Senate when the bill was before this body that I doubted whether more than 25 per cent of the $100,000,000 would ever be returned to the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in addition to the $100,000,000 there is $100,000,000 worth of medical supplies absolutely donated to the stricken people of Europe.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is there not to be a detailed statement with reference to those expenditures?

Mr. SMOOT. I hope there will be, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is it not necessary? Does not even the Constitution require a detailed presentation to the public of all expenditures of public money?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; I do not think the Constitution requires a detailed statement; but I think that in the joint resolution that was passed there was a provision requiring an itemized statement, and I hope there will be such a statement of the expenditure of that $100,000,000.

Coming now to this joint resolution, I do not care to say more. This is to benefit people who are neighbors of mine, people whom I know to be in distress; but I thought the best policy would be for the State of Montana to relieve the situation, just the same as I should expect Utah to relieve a similar condition if it were in Utah. I do not know whether the Legislature of Montana is in session at the present time or not. I doubt whether it is; but if the conditions are so serious and a great portion of the people of Montana are in distress, I see no reason why the governor of the State of Montana should not call an extra session and have the legislature make appropriations to relieve the situation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, may I call the Senator's attention to the provision to which I was referring—

> No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that simply means a general statement. They never make an itemized statement under that provision of the Constitution. What I should like to see is an itemized statement of the expenditure of the $100,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does not the Senator really think that under that provision it is necessary to account for this money and show what was done with it; that a mere general statement that it was spent abroad would not comply with the provision?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it will comply with the practice.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would it not require a statement and an account?

Mr. SMOOT. Really, an itemized statement ought to be made; and if I remember correctly the joint resolution did provide that an itemized statement of the expenditure of that money should be made to Congress within a certain time.

Mr. President, I simply felt it my duty——

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Senator from Utah allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Senator from Georgia cite the particular article and clause to which he refers?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I read it a few moments ago.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator did not state the number of the clause.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a statement?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator may put in whatever he pleases about an itemized statement, but I am curious to know whether it will be complied with. I have been going through the reports made by the grain department of the Food Administration. We had an express provision in that bill, if I remember correctly, that itemized statements should be furnished; and you will find there such interesting items as "Voucher so-and-so, to John Smith, salary and expenses," and no mortal man can tell from the papers I saw what is salary and what is expenses. I have been told that they have had men on their pay roll there drawing enormous salaries, but it is all covered up in the way of which I speak. So, while I am not objecting to the joint resolution, I think if you put in a limitation for itemization, you had better put in also a criminal penalty if it is not made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was asked a moment ago to call attention to the section to which I referred. It is article 1, section 9, paragraph 7. It uses the language "a regular statement and account." If that does not mean something more than a general statement that $100,000,000 were given abroad, I do not understand language. I do not think we could authorize the appropriation without requiring a "regular statement and account," and I think we ought to have it made in every case of expenditure.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] stated, my attention has been called to the fact that not only did they pay these exorbitant salaries and enormous expenses, but they made a profit of nearly $23,000,000 upon the wheat that was handled last year.

I have before me the act appropriating $100,000,000 for the relief of the distressed people of foreign countries, and this is the proviso to which I referred:

> That a report of the receipts, expenditures, and an itemized statement of such receipts and expenditures made under this appropriation shall be submitted to Congress not later than the first day of the next regular session.

This calls specifically, I will say to the Senator, for an itemized statement.

I am not going to say anything more about this joint resolution at this time, other than this: I do believe that it is very dangerous legislation and another very dangerous precedent established by its passage.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I quote from the report of the Committee on Military Affairs upon the measure under consideration:

> There is to-day in the State of Montana a drought unparalleled in the history of the United States. The drought of this year followed partial droughts during the years 1917 and 1918, and, coupled with the general high cost of living, has produced a situation in this part of the country that is most serious and that demands immediate relief.

The situation arises from something in the nature of a great elemental catastrophe.

Reference has been made to the precedent that would be set by this legislation. The precedents justifying legislation of this character are so numerous that argument on that line has ceased to have any particular force.

I hold in my hand a copy of an act passed by the Congress and approved on the 7th day of August, 1916, appropriating $540,000 for the relief of flood sufferers in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Tennessee, and Mississippi.

Also, a joint resolution approved February 15, 1916, authorizing the Secretary of War to loan, issue, or use quartermaster and medical supplies for the relief of destitute persons in the districts overflowed by the Mississippi and its tributaries.

Also, an act approved October 1, 1918, appropriating $1,000,000 for the eradication of influenza and other communicable diseases.

Also, the act, heretofore referred to, approved February 25, 1919, appropriating $100,000,000 for people rendered destitute by the war in Europe.

Also, an act approved May 13, 1902, for the relief of citizens of the French West Indies who suffered by reason of an earthquake in that region.

I have caused to be prepared, Mr. President, a schedule of legislation of this character dating back to the year 1802, which I shall ask to have printed in the RECORD. I refer to the fact, however, that as early as 1836 an act was passed for the relief of sufferers by fire in the city of New York.

As early as 1827 an act was passed for the relief of the sufferers from fire at Alexandria, Va.

On another occasion an act was passed for the relief of sufferers by fire in the city of Norfolk, Va.

A long list of these includes an act passed on the 1st day of September, 1890, for the relief of citizens of the State of Oklahoma rendered destitute by reason of drought.

Accordingly the precedent has already been established, be it good or evil.

I should like to say to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] that I can scarcely consider legislation of this character as in the same category as legislation to relieve destitution not occasioned by some great climatic condition, such as a flood or an extraordinary drought of this character. I can not believe that it stands in exactly the same attitude as destitution that arises from ordinary or anticipatable economic conditions. Those we have always heretofore deemed might very properly be taken care of by the local government. But whenever a catastrophe of this character arises, not easily or readily to be anticipated, Congress has not been niggardly in extending Federal aid.

I desire to state to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that the Legislature of the State of Montana was convened in extraordinary session by the call of the governor to deal with the situation and has done everything that it felt itself able to do. We felt, however, that we might very properly appeal to the Federal Government for the meager aid that is provided in the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want the Senator from Montana to know that my attitude toward this legislation is no different from my attitude toward the greater part of the legislation to which he referred, because I think the measures to which he particularly called the attention of the Senate were passed since I have been a Member of the Senate; and when they were up for consideration I took the same position—that it was a very dangerous precedent to establish. Every time that we pass a measure of this character it simply means fastening upon the United States the policy to a greater extent. I felt hesitancy in saying what I did, but I did not feel that I would be justified in not saying anything at this time.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the case presented to the Committee on Military Affairs is one which appealed very strongly to every sentiment of humanity and naturally created a desire to respond for the relief of the unfortunate people in some sections of the State of Montana. I do not know of any instance coming under my observation since I have been a Member of the Senate which justifies relief from the General Government more than the one under consideration.

It is difficult to entertain, much less to express, an objection to the enactment of such legislation because of such conditions, lest one be misunderstood or misconstrued. I therefore voted to report this measure favorably, because of the circumstances to which I have referred and also because we have already enacted similar legislation to meet cases with which we were not so directly concerned. I refer, of course, to the appropriation of $100,000,000 to be used in feeding the starving peoples of the European Continent. I voted against that measure, notwithstanding the appeal which was made to my sentiments of humanity, largely because I felt that it would be invoked inevitably as a precedent to justify similar appropriations which might arise both at home and abroad.

All such appeals to the Treasury of the United States are based upon the mistaken notion that it is the duty and the prerogative of the Government to come to the relief of those of its citizens who, by misfortune or by their own lack of judgment or for other reasons, are suffering for some of the comforts or necessities of life. We have been encouraging that tendency, more and more obvious, more and more pressing upon the Treasury, and more and more subversive of the real objects and purposes for which the Government is supposed to exist and function.

If this were a direct contribution from the Treasury, I should have voted against it, as I have voted against all of similar import, so far as my memory now serves me, that have been presented for consideration. I am able to justify my vote for a favorable report of this measure entirely upon the fact that the Government is now possessed, owing to the fortunate and abrupt termination of the war, with a large amount of surplus material, among which are many foodstuffs that are being disposed of, not only because it is just that the people should have them but for the purpose of lowering the levels of the cost of living. Montana is entitled, as a part of the Union, to its proportion of that surplus, and ordinarily should be required to pay into the Treasury the value thereof or the price fixed by the Government; but the people there are not at present in a condition to do so, as I understand the situation.

The purposes of the joint resolution being to furnish the people of Montana with part of the surplus which the Government now has and must get rid of, it presents a unique situation which enables it, I think without trenching upon those prerogatives or stretching its power, to comply with, and it is that feature and that feature only of the situation which I think justifies us in a favorable consideration of the measure. I know that it too will be used as a precedent. There is no question about it.

The drought which has affected Montana so sorely is not entirely local to that State. It prevails very largely throughout what are commonly known as the public-land States or the Rocky Mountain section of the Union, where dry farming, so called, has become an extensive occupation and one which in ordinary years is successful and adds very largely to the sum total of our annual agricultural production. This drought has visited its consequences upon the eastern part of Colorado, where the people are also engaged in dry farming, upon Wyoming, upon Utah, and doubtless upon New Mexico and Arizona. Fortunately we have not suffered so severely, and as far as my

State is concerned I think I can say with perfect safety that it is prepared to and will take care of its own. I should very much regret the exhibition of any other tendency or purpose on the part of my own people.

I make this statement, Mr. President, in explanation of the attitude which I have assumed upon this measure, and which differs so radically and materially from that which I have occupied upon those of the same character in the past.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, it is true there are precedents for this legislation, but I think it is time to stop this kind of legislation. The Government is in a worse condition financially now than it has been heretofore, and it would be impossible for it to contribute to every worthy cause that might be presented. We are suffering now in the South from the boll weevil; there is almost a total failure of the cotton crop in some sections, and those people would have an equal right to come here and ask for an appropriation. Suffering by drought is almost an annual occurrence in some parts of our country. I can see no end to this kind of legislation once entered upon, and I think it is time that we stop and kill the precedent.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, there are some things which I would like to be informed upon with reference to this joint resolution which I do not understand now. I do understand, however, I think, that the food which is now on hand belongs to the Government and is to be distributed pro rata among the States. That food will go to the States to be disposed of by the States as they may see fit. This is a proposition, as I understand it——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the Senator is not correctly advised as to that. The sales are made by the War Department, not assigned to the States at all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. They are not made to a State as a State?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The War Department is now disposing of its excess food supplies, and in that disposition, so that it may be distributed throughout the country, it has allotted a certain amount to each State. What the basis of the distribution is I do not know. Then it sells in a State that amount.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It sells without regard to the State organization for the distribution of the food?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is no State organization for distribution. The food is put up for sale by the War Department in the State. It is put there for sale. It sold the other day in the District of Columbia a certain amount allotted to the District of Columbia. Anyone who wants to buy may come there and bid at the sale for the stuff.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether there has been any shipped to Montana or not, but in the allotment to the State they are to pay the freight on whatever goods are ordered to Montana through whatever agency handles the goods there. In some States the governor has appointed a commission to handle the goods, but whoever orders them must be responsible parties or somebody back of them must be responsible. Then, whatever is the cost of the goods to the Government, plus the expense of getting the goods to the State, is the price at which the goods are to be sold in that State to whoever may purchase them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They are mere agencies of the War Department in making the disposition.

Mr. SMOOT. The War Department has the disposal of the food products on hand and makes the distribution.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But under all circumstances, whatever the arrangement, they are to be paid for by the people of the State or by the State itself.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This joint resolution proposes that Montana's share, whatever it is, shall be donated to a certain class of people specified in the resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Only so much as the President shall decide is necessary.

Mr. TOWNSEND. A part or all of it is to be donated to certain people in the State of Montana, so that it makes an exception to the general rule of disposition. It is not supposed by the Senator or by anybody else that the goods will be paid for which are distributed under the joint resolution.

Mr. President, I am very much in favor of granting relief where it is needed. I think I am more in favor of doing it for people in the United States than I am in favor of sending it abroad, believing that charity begins at home. I am not clear, however, that this is an entirely proper request for the State of Montana to make at this time. It is provided in the joint resolution, as I read it and for the first time, that this relief shall be given in cases where there has been a total or partial loss of crops occasioned by drought. Of course, I suppose it would not be difficult to prove that there had been a partial loss of crops in many parts of Montana. There is always a partial loss of crops either from drought or freshet in every State in the Union. Michigan, for instance, has suffered severely this year on account of drought and on account of forest fires. Our State, however, has never come to the Congress and asked for relief under such circumstances, and yet the State has granted millions of dollars of relief, which has been met by our own people.

I have not understood the Senator to claim that Montana is not able to pay for her share of the food if she wanted to distribute it. I have not heard, but possibly there is some reason why Montana's Legislature can not act in the matter now. I do not know about that; but if there is no reason, it seems to me to be rather an improper request for the State of Montana or any other State to ask the Federal Government to donate to the citizens of one of the States what it is requiring the citizens of other States to pay for.

I agree also that it seems to me to be a precedent which may arise, and probably will arise, to plague us not only in the distant future but in the immediate future.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. May I inquire of the Senator whether he was in the Chamber when I called the attention of the Senate to innumerable instances where similar legislation has been passed and similar aid granted?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was in the Chamber, but the Senator from Montana spoke so low that I could not follow him.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me inquire: Was the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], who thought this was a bad precedent, in the Chamber when I called attention to the fact that on the 3d day of August, 1916, an act was approved appropriating $540,000 for the relief of flood sufferers in various States of the Union?

Mr. DIAL. Yes; I was here.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I hardly think that is a parallel case with this, however. I believe we have been making some mistakes in the way we have been doing things, but there was an appropriation made out of the Treasury for the relief of certain flood sufferers in the United States. All States were included in that act where the flood extended. The Senator now proposes in the pending joint resolution to make an exception to the rule or proposition which has been laid down for the distribution of Army supplies. The Senator proposes that the people of Michigan and all the other States in the United States shall pay for what they receive, and there are probably just as great sufferers in other States as there are in Montana. The Senator proposes that they shall pay for what they get, but that this shall be given to the people of Montana, thus making a discrimination among the people who ought to be beneficiaries under the general proposition.

It seems to me that this is rather unwise legislation, and yet I hesitate greatly to interfere with granting relief if it is actually necessary in Montana. But I know if we do it we ought to grant relief in all the States whose people are suffering equally with those in Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, I had a word to say about the matter, and gave the Senate my own views upon it a little while ago. I imagine perhaps the Senator from Michigan was not in the Chamber at the time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was in the Chamber, but the Senator speaks so low, and there was so much confusion in the Chamber, that I was unable to follow him. I regret that exceedingly, because I am always interested in what the Senator has to say.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I called the attention of the Senate to a long list of acts passed by Congress under circumstances substantially like these, dating away back to 1802, cases in which cities were visited by great fires; the city of Baltimore, for instance, and the city of Boston. The city of San Francisco, on the occasion of the great earthquake there, was extended aid by the Federal Government in various ways. I called attention to specific instances in which legislation was enacted for the relief of those who had suffered by flood. I am utterly unable to distinguish in principle between those who suffer by reason of an extraordinary flood and those who suffer by reason of an extraordinary drought. I called attention to the fact that in 1880 we passed an act for the relief of people in the then Territory of Oklahoma who suffered by reason of an extraordinary drought.

In the list which I sent to the desk, and which will be incorporated in the RECORD, there is a reference to acts that were passed for the relief of people in the Western States who suffered by reason of the devastation of grasshoppers and various acts of that character.

Let me say in answer to the Senator from Michigan that I am not responsible for restricting this relief to the State of Montana. I drafted the resolution and it was presented so that every public-land State that had suffered by reason of this extraordinary drought should equally participate in the advantages and the beneficences of the Federal Government.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Why public-land States?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Because there has been no such extraordinary drought anywhere else in the United States that I have heard of. The report says that this is the most extraordinary drought that has ever occurred in the history of the United States, following upon two years of partial loss of crops by reason of unusual drought. So the condition which confronts us is one that is brought about by elemental causes that would not ordinarily be anticipated, and it stands upon an entirely different footing from cases of destitution that exist simply by reason of economic conditions that are always with us, as a matter of course. This, as I take it and as I feel it ought to be considered by the Senate, is something in the nature of a catastrophe, like an earthquake or a great fire or an extraordinary flood or something of that kind. As a matter of course, there are floods in many sections every year, but when there is an extraordinary flood, such as occurred in the State of Ohio in the year 1913, in the State adjacent to his own, the Senator will recall that considerable loss of life followed and property of very great value was destroyed; destitution prevailed throughout a very great region there. The War Department went to work and extended aid without any authority whatever from Congress. My recollection is the appropriateness of extending relief under those circumstances appealed to every Member of Congress so strongly that Congress subsequently passed a curative act relieving the War Department and ratifying and confirming whatever had been done in the premises. The condition simply became public when the Secretary of War directed a general of the Army to go there to issue rations, and that kind of thing, for the purpose of relieving the destitution which there existed. There was not then on the floor of the Senate—I was here at the time—any such opposition as is voiced to this measure. I dare say the Senator from Utah is correct, that he voted against it; but I am perfectly certain that there was no opposition voiced upon the floor such as is now evidenced here in opposition to this measure, and I really can not understand it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has partially answered, at least, the question which I was going to ask him; in other words, he has answered why this was confined to Montana alone. I was going to ask him why that was so; but I still can not understand why it should be presumed that the public-land States are the only ones which have severely suffered from drought, because it is not the fact; other States in the Union have likewise suffered. It seems to me that it would be right or more nearly right to let this legislation be general, although I do not like its principle. Michigan is not asking for it; the people of Michigan are perfectly willing to pay for the goods which they receive, and if it is shown that there are people who are not able to pay for them the State will take care of them, and the help will be extended as, it seems to me, it ought properly to be extended.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me suggest an amendment to the Senator from Montana and see if he will not feel that it ought to be agreed to. I suggest, in line 1, page 2, to strike out the words "total or partial loss" and to insert the words "the loss of the greater portion," so that it would read:

In consequence of the loss of the greater portion of crop.

There is no need of saying "total loss" so long as the word "partial" is inserted, because one is included in the other. I think that the Senator will agree that unless people have lost a greater portion of their crops they can get along very well. I simply suggest the amendment to the Senator from Montana for his consideration.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have not the slightest objection to the change; but perhaps I should have stated to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who made the criticism of the language, that it seems carefully guarded. Even those who lose all their crops do not become entitled to any relief under this joint resolution unless they are in need. The language is:

Who are in need in consequence of total or partial loss of crop.

If a man is well fixed, although he has lost his entire crop, he is not entitled to any relief under this proposed legislation, and if a man has really thrashed 3 or 4 bushels of grain and he is still in need, he gets the relief under it. However, I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will admit that under the language of this bill if the crop should have been 20 bushels per acre and it turned out to be only 19 bushels, that would be a partial loss; and I do not think the Senator would want to take care of such a case.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course that was not my purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will accept the amendment I have proposed, inserting the words "the loss of a greater portion," I think that would be very much better than the present wording of the joint resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am quite willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHELAN in the chair). The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, it is proposed to strike out the words "total or partial loss" and to insert the words "the loss of a greater portion," so that it will read:

In consequence of the loss of a greater portion of crop.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I suggest that it should be "the whole or greater portion."

Mr. SMOOT. That will be all right; let it read "the whole or a greater portion," although I think if such sufferers are really entitled to relief on account of the loss of a greater portion of the crop they certainly would be entitled to relief if they lost the whole of it. However, it makes no difference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I think the need and justification for the enactment of this proposed legislation is very great and urgent. Congress has been very liberal in times past in voting appropriations of money to sufferers, in different parts of the country, from flood and fire; and I can see no distinction whatever, in principle, in voting relief to sufferers from flood or fire and sufferers from drought. Each is an act of Providence, a providential calamity that nothing could prevent; such that the individuals who suffer from it are powerless to remedy it. They must look to some higher and greater source from which to obtain a remedy, and that source in most instances of a serious nature has been the Congress of the United States. It is not only just but human to take care of our own.

I can not agree with those who say that, while there is plenty of precedent for such legislation, we should now stop it, because our expenses during the war have been very great. It may be that we should be more cautious than heretofore about extending this sort of relief and about voting money directly out of the Treasury of the United States, but I think each case should be judged by its urgency and the necessity of the occasion. In this case I know the necessity to be very great.

This proposed legislation, however, is not to vote money out of the Treasury of the United States; it is merely to put in the discretion of the President the power to donate to Montana sufferers from drought such portion of the allotment of Montana's quota of surplus Army food as he may deem expedient and proper. It can not interfere with the quota of any other State. It does not call for the donation to drought sufferers of all of Montana's quota of such supplies. If enacted, the President may order donated all or any part of Montana's quota, or none of it, as he may see fit. It is quite different from voting money directly out of the Federal Treasury.

In response to the inquiry as to why this proposed legislation is confined to Montana, and the further inquiry as to why it should extend at most only to the public-land States, I will say that I have heard of no drought of any consequence this year anywhere in the United States except in the upper Rocky Mountain States, all of which are public-land States. There is where the drought is. There is where the suffering exists.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

Mr. MYERS. With pleasure.

Mr. HARRISON. I note that this joint resolution, as introduced by the Senator's colleague [Mr. WALSH of Montana], confined the relief not to one State, but extended it to the region of certain public-land States.

Mr. MYERS. It did, as introduced.

Mr. HARRISON. I was going to ask the Senator if he and his colleague would not let the resolution be passed so as to embrace the whole region that is affected, instead of applying it only to one State? I recall that the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] recently came before a committee of which I happen to be a member and made a very splendid speech portraying the unfortunate condition prevailing in Montana, but it seems to me if we confine it to one State, then from other States that might be affected in the West there would be a call on their Senators to obtain similar legislation, and those Senators might feel that they ought to do as the Senators from Montana have done. In order to take care of that possibility, we might embrace the whole region and not confine this legislation to any one State.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that I do not desire the State of Utah to be included in this bill.

Mr. HARRISON. But there may be other States in that region which might desire to be inserted in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I doubt whether there are.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, let me interpolate here that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is a member of the committee, says that he does not want Wyoming included.

Mr. HARRISON. If that be true, there would be no use of putting in the other States; but in order to avoid appeals being made to Senators representing other States adjacent to Montana in the near future, and likewise demands being made by them, the joint resolution ought to embrace the whole region.

I might say in this connection, if the Senator will permit me, that I am in full sympathy with the purposes of the joint resolution. I recall time and again when suffering has occurred in my section of the country that Congress has come to our relief. I remember a few years ago that $250,000 was appropriated by Congress, I think, to take care of some sufferers from a cyclone in my State. I also recall, I think four years ago, when there was a fire in Salem, Mass., that we passed an appropriation carrying, I believe, $250,000 for those sufferers. I think that we ought to pass this legislation, but if there is any other section than Montana affected, we ought also to take care of that section.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, personally I would have no objection to that. The resolution was drawn and introduced in that form, but the Senate Committee on Military Affairs saw fit to restrict it to Montana. To that I make no objection; either form is acceptable to me. It makes no difference to me so long as Montana sufferers get needed relief.

I am sorry to say that the terrible drought which prevails this year in the Rocky Mountain country is far worse in Montana than in any other State, and has hurt Montana more than any other State in the Union. Montana is the chief sufferer. Conditions are peculiar there; they are not like conditions in South Carolina, Michigan, and other old States. I believe most of the drought sufferers in Montana, or at any rate a very large proportion of them, are homesteaders who have not yet obtained title to their homesteads. Consequently they have no land to mortgage in order to raise money to meet their needs. They have no title to land to offer as security for money. They are nearly all poor people. They are struggling. They came to Montana poor. They have but little personal property—usually a few horses, a few milch cows—and, of course, such domestic animals as they may have they need to keep. Doubtless all of their personal property is under mortgage. As a rule they have had to mortgage everything they own. Homesteaders who have not obtained title to their land, as a rule, have no credit at the stores, because they have exhausted it in the last few years of drought. They are unable to obtain money at the banks, because they have no security to offer. Those conditions are peculiar to public-land States, and they are not like the conditions found in South Carolina and Michigan or any other old State.

There is no dispute about the great need and want existing in Montana. That is not questioned at all; the committee which examined into the pending resolution established that beyond question. Now, let us face this fairly and squarely. Are we willing to treat our own suffering people as well as we treat foreigners?

Last fall Congress voted $100,000,000 to people in Europe who were said to be suffering and in want. It was ostensibly loaned, but I do not think anyone expects to get back much of it. I regarded it as a donation at the time and so characterized it.

In addition to that, we have made an absolute donation of $100,000,000 worth of medical supplies to the people of Europe, to relieve reputed want and suffering there. Surely we can afford to give some old Army supplies and surplus food on hand to sufferers in our own country. If we can not do that we are taking better care of the people of foreign countries than of our own people. If we are to be generous, let our generosity begin at home. If we would be just, let our justice begin at home. I am for America first. I say, let us put Americans before all others. Let us take care of our own first. That is patriotism. Thousands of poor, unfortunate people in Montana, mostly homesteaders, after three years of withering drought, this year the most awful of all, are without food, subsistence for man or beast, money, or credit. They are in dire distress. They are suffering to-day from want of food. They are good American citizens. We have the food on hand. It belongs to the United States Government. These sufferers helped to pay for it. We have been good to others. Let us be good to our own. I earnestly hope the joint resolution may be adopted.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I wish to suggest that I can conceive of conditions justifying the Government appropriating money to help the unfortunate, and I do not wish to be understood as being totally opposed to such action in some cases that may arise. It seems to me, however, that we should be very careful and go very slowly; otherwise we will have to establish a commission to roam all over the United States to provide for people who do not make as much as they think they ought to make. They will be coming to Congress at all times. In this matter it seems to me that we might supply a remedy by selling to the State of Montana certain supplies on time, giving them time in which to pay for them. I believe that would answer the purpose; but I do not want to be altogether out of harmony with the trend of the day. I do say, however, that I think it is high time for this Government to go very slow about making appropriations for anything.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the committee amendments.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 1, line 4, after the word "prescribe," to insert "and to the extent that, in his judgment, at the time of distribution, the exigencies of the service require."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out the word "require," in line 6, and substituting the word "permit."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 1, line 7, after the word "families," to insert "in Montana in 1919, who are"; on page 2, at the beginning of line 2, to insert the word "such"; and in the same line, after the word "drought," to strike out "in any State in which such conditions prevail."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 5, after the word "to," to strike out "and sold in such" and insert "said."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask that the Senate disagree to that amendment and restore the original language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I now move to strike out the word "such," in line 5, on page 2, and substitute the word "said," so that it will read:

As would otherwise be allotted to and sold in said State.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Was the amendment offered by me agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Utah, striking out the words "total or partial loss" and substituting the words "the loss of the whole or a greater portion," was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was amended so as to read:

Whereas an extraordinary and unprecedented drought, resulting in an almost total failure of crops, in the State of Montana has occasioned great destitution therein: Therefore be it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I send to the desk and ask to have printed in the RECORD the schedule to which I have referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The schedule referred to is as follows:

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 127, being Senate bill 2775, known as the oil leasing bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphates, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he expects to secure a vote on this bill this afternoon?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I expect to secure a vote on it to-day.

Mr. KENYON. Would the Senator have any serious objection to the matter going over until Monday? All Senators, I assume, are very busy. A number of Senators have been tied up the whole week in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in connection with hearings on what are known as the packer bills. I have been amongst those Senators, and I have not had an opportunity to study this bill. It may be that it is my own fault, but I do not think so. It is, as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, a bill of tremendous importance. We have had, year after year, bills on this subject before us. I do not mean to impute anything to anybody, and I hope that will be thoroughly understood; but there is a feeling upon the part of some men that in a few years, under these bills, we are going to find all the oil lands of the United States in the hands of the Standard Oil Co., and a few men and a few monopolies controlling the whole thing. I want to be confident that that can not be done under this bill; and not having had the advantage of hearing the Senator from Utah or the Senator from Montana, in whose judgment I have great confidence, I am just in that condition. I do not think the Senator ought to insist upon a vote this afternoon. I think it should go over until Monday, and give us a chance between now and then to make a more thorough study of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will take my word for it, I will assure him that neither the Standard Oil Co. nor any other corporation nor any other individual can ever, under this bill, secure control of the oil deposits of the United States. It is limited in every possible way to 2,560 acres of land. I will say to the Senator that a violation of it, even in the holding of a share of stock in a corporation that has more than that, immediately forfeits the lease that the company may have or that the individual may own.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator kindly tell the Senate when this bill was first reported to the Senate and printed—on what day?

Mr. SMOOT. August 15, I think.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator think it is an unreasonable request that a bill of this magnitude and importance, presented to the Senate for the first time on August 15, should be continued for a vote until Monday next?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the committees to which the Senator from Iowa has referred will be in session on Monday. I thought that Saturday afternoon was the very best day in the week to have the Senators who are interested in this most vital legislation in the Chamber.

Mr. KENYON. There are 13 Senators now in the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. That is about three or four more than we generally have.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. We have had this bill before the Senate as the unfinished business since a week ago yesterday. We made it the unfinished business at that time.

Mr. KENYON. But there is no other important business before the Senate next week, is there?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I will let the Senator from South Dakota answer that question, or I can name a number of measures to the Senator from Iowa myself.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that several days ago I gave notice that immediately on the disposal of the oil-land leasing bill I should move the consideration of the prohibition bill.

Mr. KENYON. That is a drought bill, too? [Laughter.]

Mr. STERLING. Yes; and I sincerely hope that the oil-land leasing bill may be voted upon and finally disposed of this afternoon. It is not in the immediate interest of the oil-land leasing bill that I urge this action, but in the interest of the prohibition bill, which I hope to bring on at an early date; and I hope to be able to move the consideration of the bill this afternoon, in order that it may be the unfinished business when the Senate convenes next Monday.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that there have been no amendments offered by Senators to the bill as yet. I felt that on Saturday afternoon, when we began the offering of amendments, we ought to have the Senators here, and then these disputed questions, if there are any, would be discussed not in a long speech, but in short, concise statements as to the particular amendment, and I wish the Senators were here to hear both sides of the case and then vote upon the matter.

Mr. KENYON. If a quorum can be kept here this afternoon, and the discussion of these matters can take place in the presence of a quorum, I would not have the serious objection that I have now.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. I have no authority to speak for others than myself; but if we are only to have 10 or 12 Senators here on this important bill, practically disposing of what is left of the public domain, and, as I have feared, turning it into the hands of great interests, I do not think the bill will be voted on this afternoon.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not say that it will be voted on this afternoon.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I desire to add my request to that of the Senator from Iowa to the effect that the bill go over until next Monday. It is one of exceeding importance. I consider this bill one of the most important now pending in this Congress, for the reason that it provides for the disposition of the comparatively little that remains of certain of the natural resources of this country, more particularly coal and gas and oil.

The bill was reported to the Senate on the 15th of this month. There was no written report accompanying it, according to my information. Therefore we have no means of knowing, so far as writing is concerned, the particular reasons that actuated the committee in placing particular provisions in this bill. There are a number of us who are exceedingly desirous of giving this bill a further and a more critical examination than we have had the opportunity to do heretofore, and under those circumstances I ask in all fairness—and I think it is a reasonable request—that the further consideration of the bill be deferred until Monday.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Idaho that I can take him over to the Public Lands Committee and show him not one ton but tons of documents in the way of hearings upon a leasing bill. Report after report has been made. For 10 long years this subject has been before Congress.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, the Senator will bear in mind, I hope, the fact that there are a number of us in this Chamber who are new or comparatively new Members, and that we are not as familiar with the reports to which the Senator refers as are those who have sat here for years, and we are seeking information in respect to these matters.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true; but I think the bill has been before the Senate once or twice since the Senator from Idaho has been a Member of this body.

Mr. NUGENT. On a conference report only, to the best of my recollection.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, I will say to the Senator that we could not have a conference report before this body unless the bill had passed both Houses of Congress.

Mr. NUGENT. That may have been, but I do not know but that the bill had passed or was considered by the Senate prior to the time the conference report was considered during my membership.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I will say to the Senator that during his service the bill passed through the House, and the conference report was made and defeated in the last days of the last session of Congress.

Now, Mr. President, I want to be perfectly reasonable. I do not want to ask of any Senator an unreasonable thing, but I do think we ought to proceed now with amendments and see how far we can go to-day. Then if we can not get through to-day it seems to me the only thing to do is to give notice that beginning on Monday we will resume the consideration of the bill and hold the Senate in session as long as possible in the evening, and take recesses from day to day until the bill passes.

When I asked for consideration of the bill last Wednesday it was requested then that I should not force the bill through that day. I told them certainly not; there was no such intention. On Thursday the same thing happened, and I said no; certainly not. I fully expected that the bill would be passed yesterday, but it was not, and I did expect that before we adjourned to-day we would have the bill passed; but evidently there seems to be an impression here that it ought to go over until Monday. I do not want to be placed in the position of having it said that I forced action upon the bill, but here it is, not 2 o'clock to-day. We have four hours left, the balance of this day.

The junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has offered a line of amendments to the bill. I do not know of a better day than Saturday to take up those amendments and consider them. Every Senator ought to be as free to speak to-day as he would be on Monday, because I think the amendments are all of a general character, and when a policy is adopted more than likely the same thing will be adopted all the way through the bill. I am quite sure the Senator from Massachusetts has no objection to beginning the consideration of his amendments at this time.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I have very strong objection. I consider the amendments to be of a character that affects the very heart of the bill, and I will ask to have a roll call on them, and I do not believe it is possible to have enough Senators here to organize a quorum of the Senate to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. In order to test that, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before the Senator presses that suggestion, I should like to say a word.

Mr. SMOOT. I will withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if this were the first that the Senate of the United States had ever heard of this legislation there would be some force to the suggestion that further consideration of it ought to be deferred until next week. It is not, however, the first that the Senate has heard of it. This legislation, in practically the form in which it is now before the Senate, has been pending before this body for five years. A bill in every essential particular like the one now before the Senate had the elaborate consideration of the Senate during the month of January, 1918, at which time my recollection is that the Senator from Idaho was a Member of this body.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment further, the bill passed, as my recollection is, about the last of the month of January, and remained pending the action of the House of Representatives, which occupied several months of the succeeding summer in the consideration of the legislation, and then went to the conference committee of both Houses and remained before the conference committee of both Houses for something like eight months, when it was reported to this body, and was before this body at least three weeks before the adjournment last spring, and was extensively discussed upon the report of the conference committee at that time.

Mr. NUGENT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. NUGENT. I am advised that the bill to which the Senator refers passed the Senate on January 7, 1918. If I remember correctly I was sworn in as a Member of this body on the 28th day of January, 1918. I was appointed on the 22d, if my recollection serves me right. Consequently, I was not a Member of this body at the time the matter was being discussed and prior to the passage of the bill. I do remember, however, that there was a discussion with respect to a conference report, which, if my recollection serves me right, occupied about three or four hours a day or two prior to the adjournment of the last session. I have not had an opportunity to read any of the reports which have been submitted by the committee with regard to the bill that passed the Senate in 1918 or with respect to this bill; and no report has been submitted to the Senate, as I understand, with regard to this measure. Therefore I again say that it appears to me to be a reasonable request, in view of the fact that there are other Senators here who are in the same situation that I am so far as information is concerned; and as this bill is one of tremendous importance, I should be glad if it could be permitted to go over until Monday.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the bill is of tremendous importance to the State represented by the distinguished Senator who has just addressed the Senate. It affects 1,286,687 acres of land in his State, and, of course, he ought to have every opportunity to inquire into it. Undoubtedly there is no item of legislation pending before the Congress that compares with it in importance so far as his own State is concerned.

Take the matter of phosphates, dealt with in the bill: 1,015.717 acres of land believed to contain deposits of phosphates, in the State of Idaho, have been withheld from public entry, actually standing there undisposed of and not yielding any revenue, and not contributing in any way to the resources of the State now for some five or six years, at least. It is a matter of very profound importance to the Senator from Idaho; and so, Mr. President, abundant time ought to be given to consider it. It does seem to me that since the Senator has been here now for nearly 18 months, with this legislation pending before the Senate, and affecting such vital interests of his own State as it does, he ought to be fairly well advised by this time concerning at least the general features of the legislation.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. Of course, many of us realize that what the Senator is saying is correct in every way. The enormous importance of this legislation is recognized, and many of us have been interested in it for years. We have differed as to how these oil and phosphate lands should be developed, but the necessity, particularly now, for developing them in some way so that the people may have the product is apparent to everyone, and must be.

In my State recently I think I am safe in saying that over 5,000,000 acres of land have been located under the placer law, which is the only method by which you can secure even any rights at all on the public domain with reference to petroleum—I mean 5,000,000 acres which have not been reserved. In coal areas over 5,000,000 acres have been reserved, which we have not been able to handle at all for years, while we needed coal in the United States. The same thing may or may not be true with reference to petroleum, but at any rate the people think there is petroleum there. They are ready to put in their money to develop it. They have sought to secure some character of title. Consequently they have made locations under the placer act. They have been told that it was very doubtful whether any location was good until after the discovery was made, although we have local statutes which attempt not to contradict but to run along with the United States laws; so there is the legal question, and when there is a legal question you can not raise the money, so that everything is at a standstill. Now, some of us who have held entirely different views as to the proper legislation have finally agreed to conform to the views as embodied in this bill; and I think those of us who have been working along those lines are entitled to ask that an early settlement of the question may be made, in order that our States may be developed.

I thank the Senator for permitting this interruption.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I was going to say a word further. This, I believe, is the third day this measure has now been before the Senate, and I would be indisposed myself to yield to any request for a postponement of further consideration of it in order that a further study of it might be made by Senators were it not for the remark made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], for whose attention I should be quite thankful, namely, that he is advised, or at least certain persons are filled with apprehension lest under the operation of the bill all the oil lands of the country would pass to the Standard Oil. I regret that the Senator from Iowa should have thought suggestions of that character of sufficient importance to dignify them by repeating them upon the floor of the United States Senate. Of course, I can not understand such a reference as signifying anything except that those who have been endeavoring to secure the passage of this legislation are either actuated by a desire to promote the ends of the Standard Oil Co., or that they are not capable of recognizing the purpose which he says it is reported to him the Standard Oil Co. has to appropriate these lands. That is so serious a charge that for myself, and I have been somewhat identified with the legislation from its inception, I should like to give the Senator from Iowa every opportunity to satisfy himself upon that point, and I hope he will come before the Senate when he has satisfied himself upon the point and give us the benefit of his judgment about it.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am not making any such charge. What I say is that it has been suggested to me that under the terms of the bill within a few years we will find the Standard Oil Co. in possession of practically all of these lands, and I am not at all certain that they are not correct. That is all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In view of the statement repeated by the Senator from Iowa, I am going to ask the chairman to give the Senator from Iowa every reasonable opportunity to present his views.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Montana that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] desires to speak for a few moments at this time, and at the conclusion of what he has to say I am going to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that a vote be taken upon the bill not later than 6 o'clock on Monday, August 25.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall agree to that if the Senator from Iowa has complied with my request.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Iowa has no objection to it whatever.

Mr. KENYON. I have no objection at all.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is agreeable to it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I shall welcome consent to have a vote taken at 6 o'clock on Monday, because that will give time to those Senators in the Chamber who have not had an opportunity to study the bill and who should receive all the information possible. I am disposed to agree to it, because between now and Monday they will have had that opportunity.

I want to repeat, if I am correctly informed by Senators in the Chamber, that the bill deals with properties of countless value, of which no human being knows the value to the Government and the people of this country. I propose to see that the public interests are protected as far as possible, and that is not a reflection upon the committee, because I think they have inserted many wise safeguards. I want to say also that for one week thus far has the bill been under consideration before the Senate dealing with this gigantic undertaking. I do not object to the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the members of the Committee on Public Lands are just as much interested in guarding the interests of the United States in the public lands as can possibly be any other Senator in this Chamber.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; and you have had many months to do it, while we have had only a week to do it; and that is why we want more time.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for just a statement?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. I simply want to make a statement with reference to the bill, in view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. The purpose of some of us yesterday in insisting that the first section should be amended so as to allow, under certain restrictions, alien ownership was for the very purpose of putting the one great competitor of the Standard Oil Co. in the world in a position where it could compete in the American market.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have received within the past three weeks a large number of letters, petitions, and telegrams from citizens of the State of Arizona, and some letters and telegrams from other States, the signers of which urged me to vote against the pending leasing bill. I have not seen fit to place in the RECORD any of those letters and telegrams, but the truth is a wide misapprehension prevails as to what is the situation throughout the United States with respect to coal, oil, phosphate, and shale.

I have no doubt that the able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is earnestly anxious to conserve the public weal and save such natural resources as may remain. I have no doubt that the able Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] desires the same. But, Mr. President, those of us who live in Arizona, Montana, New Mexico, Utah, Nevada, Colorado, California, and other Western States know whereof we speak. We are dealing with practical things, and I say to those who are opposing the bill that if they prevent all legislation on this subject they are doing the very thing the Standard Oil Co. wants.

Some years ago Mr. Gifford Pinchot and other "conservationists" stirred up the country and made it believe that we should abandon the old mining laws which built the West, the old mining system that furnished the gold to pay the Federal soldiers, the old system of homesteading, where the man with strong arm and courageous heart could go upon the land and build a home, and the false conservationists made many persons believe that we must adopt the German system and the system England has imposed upon Ireland. Thus the alleged conservationists propose to make a preserve out of the entire West and subject millions of American citizens to a system of "absentee landlordism." For 10 years it has been utterly impossible for a man of modest means to get an oil claim or a coal claim. It has been utterly impossible for a man, unless he were a millionaire, to get hold of any oil land, and why? A citizen goes out upon the public domain and locates a claim with his strong arm, puts up his monuments, and begins work. It now costs $60,000 to drill an oil well, and one-third of the holes drilled even in proven ground are failures. Moreover, when the citizen locates a claim and complies with the law the Executive power withdraws the land. President after President seem to fall under the same baleful view that we must conserve the resources of the country by taking them from our people.

What built the great West? What built that splendid State of Iowa, so well represented here? The homestead law, under the operation of which a man could go out with his wife and his children and by hard labor make nature bring forth bountiful crops. That system made the State of Iowa great. What made the State of Colorado? The mining law, whereby the miner with nothing but a pick, a shovel, and perseverance could smite the hard ledge and make nature pour forth her golden streams into the veins and channels of commerce.

The Western States have been under stagnation instead of conservation. Of course the Standard Oil and their kindred associations want more of this kind of conservation, because the kind of conservation that we now have produces nothing, makes a scarcity in the market, and allows these great corporations to take advantage of the scarcity of coal and oil and charge what they please for these necessaries.

Who is interested in keeping competing companies from getting oil on the market? The Standard Oil Co.

What made the State of Nevada, a State that has not much humidity? It was not agricultural resources which made that State. It was the gold which the miner took from the bowels of the earth; it was the silver. And it was not the strong arm of the Government that mined the metal; it was the sturdy miner. It was that law which gave to every man of courageous purpose and industrious habits the opportunity to go out and obtain a claim, develop it, and become part and parcel of the taxpaying citizenry of his country.

Mr. President, I repeat, and I assert here, if the Standard Oil Co. is taking any position on this proposition it is taking the same position it took several years ago in advocating a continued conservation, so that these locked-up resources could never reach the people.

I do not like a leasing system. I do not believe there is a single western Senator here who will rise and say he likes a leasing system. Is there a western Senator here who desires to depart from the great mining law of the past that built our States? Comes now the conservationist. I have great respect for the conservationist, but his spectacles are rainbowed. He has dreams that do not function and that will not work in the ordinary practical affairs of life. The "conservationist" has a purpose as lofty as the stars. His idealism is noble and grand, but he usually knows but little of the practical side of the question. Under the old system the idealist, if he wished to, could take his pick and put on a pair of overalls and go out and smite nature and get wealth therefrom, but he let "George do it."

I am not going to vote against this leasing system, because it is the best bill I can get, and it is poor at that.

I regret and the country will soon regret the day when we reached a leasing system. The leasing system makes it difficult for men of modest means to get a coal claim or an oil claim; but under the present situation he can get neither, because the prospector, the poor man, can not arrange the financial details of a million-dollar corporation, and under the present system unless you have a million-dollar corporation you can not get a coal claim or an oil claim. I call upon any western Senator here to deny what I am saying.

I repeat I do not like a leasing system; but I know that when you go into legislation and into diplomacy you are like a man on roller skates, you go partly where you want to go and partly where the skates take you. If I had my way we would not disturb the great law of 1872, which, I repeat, built up the West and built up all our country. Had I my way I would continue to allow the man of modest means to develop the coal claims and the oil claims.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator will, of course, remember that the beneficent law of 1872, to which he has very properly referred as being at the basis of our development in the West, has been so restricted and fettered by departmental machinery and bureaucracy and the tendency to place as many obstacles as possible between the prospector and these lands as to render it entirely nugatory in past years, with the result that our output of gold and silver, so badly needed—perhaps more badly needed than ever before in the history of the country—has been very largely circumscribed and reduced.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I ask the Senator if there has not been a scientific investigation of the natural resources of the country carried on by the Government itself at enormous expense?

Mr. ASHURST. We have spent much Government money in making scientific investigations. We have had reports so numerous that the Senator and I, if we had a large basket, could not carry them. We know how much coal we have—several hundred billions of tons——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I interrupt merely to suggest to the Senator that, notwithstanding we have this very complete method of scientific investigation, it is the truth now more than it ever was that a prospector has frequently found an oil field in sections of the country where the official geological scientific investigation declared it never was.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I dislike to interrupt the exceedingly eloquent and able remarks of the Senator from Arizona——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But I understood the Senator to say that there was a time in the early history of the leasing bill when it was very apparent that the Standard Oil interests or their friends were promoting it. Is that true?

Mr. ASHURST. It was true to this extent: The Standard Oil Co., through its agents in the West, some years ago at least, tried to encourage and stimulate among some senatorial candidates a sentiment favorable to a leasing bill, knowing that the leasing bill could not pass and that the company could thereby create an impasse, because the Executive had withdrawn all oil and coal land from exploration and development. That left the Standard Oil and its kindred friends an absolute monopoly of the market.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In the Senator's opinion, this bill is the very best leasing bill that has been presented?

Mr. ASHURST. I think so.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It safeguards individual and the public interests better than has any other bill?

Mr. ASHURST. I think that is true. I do not like a leasing bill. This is possibly a better leasing bill than the one which was before the Senate at the last session. When the vote is taken on a leasing bill I may hold my nose and vote for it. That is a poor statement to make, but the passage of a leasing bill is better than allowing powerful corporations to continue to exploit the people; it is better than allowing oil corporations to retain a monopoly. You can not stop monopoly except by putting an article of competition into the market with them. This leasing bill will at least permit a man of modest means to take a lease and to develop oil and coal.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I desire to say that in many of the mining properties before one can ship a pound of ore he has to expend from $1,000,000 to $15,000,000. That is notably true with respect to large copper properties.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My amendment only applies to oil, reducing the time of the lease from 20 years. I am informed—I do not know whether correctly or not—that the life of an oil well has been found to be not more than 20 years. Therefore a 20-year lease is practically a grant in perpetuity.

Mr. ASHURST. That may be true as to oil. I am not so well informed as to oil.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is the only amendment which I have to offer as to oil.

Mr. ASHURST. I have said this because I have been so much importuned by letters and telegrams for a statement of my position on the leasing bill. The sentiment of the State which I, in part, represent is practically unanimous against a leasing bill, and my constituents are utterly unable to see why I have been inclined to look upon this bill with some favor. I repeat, it is because I must either vote for a leasing bill or to continue to keep oil and coal lands away from the people.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. What is true of Arizona is largely true of the State which I, in part, represent. We take this bill because it is this or nothing.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. WALSH of Montana addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Arizona yield?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator from Utah will permit me, I should like to say a word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, lest my remarks, taken in connection with those of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], in reference to this matter may be misunderstood, I desire to say that I have no apology to make for my support of this measure. As is well known by those who apologize, I am in favor of the principle of this legislation. I have repeatedly declared my opposition to the policy heretofore pursued of conveying away in fee, alienating in perpetuity, lands which are the sites of water-power development and of coal, for coal and water power become the bases of all industry. For much the same reason, Mr. President, I am in favor of retaining by the General Government the title to lands containing deposits of phosphate, sodium, and other nonmetallic minerals of that character. I make a very clear distinction, which I hope the Senator from Arizona will note, between metalliferous mineral lands and nonmetalliferous mineral lands. I see no reason for changing the law of 1872 as it applies to metalliferous mineral lands. That it never was intended to apply to lands containing deposits of phosphate, sodium, nor to deposits of oil and gas, any student of the question is obliged to admit.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator yield to me at that point?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes.

Mr. ASHURST. What the Senator says is true; but it is also true that oil claims in California and other States that have been producing oil for 20 years were acquired under the law of 1872.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I agree with the Senator from Arizona; but I insist that when the law of 1872 was enacted the matter of oil claims never was thought of, and the placer-mining law, I insist, is entirely inapplicable to the appropriation of lands containing deposits of oil. I took occasion before the Committee on Public Lands three years ago to express at some length my view concerning this matter and to point out the distinction which, as I thought, existed between nonmetallic mineral lands and mineral lands that are metalliferous. I think there is a good reason why we should make a distinction between them, and we have endeavored to make it.

Some possible criticism might be made, as it seems to me, of an act which would contemplate the complete alienation of these lands, by which they were to pass entirely out of the ownership and control of the Government of the United States, that by reason of legislation of that character they might possibly get into the hands of some great interest—the oil lands, for instance, getting into the hands of the Standard Oil Co. That was one of the considerations moving us to feel that in all probability the leasing system was more applicable to the disposition of oil lands that was the old system of complete alienation. I must confess, Mr. President, some astonishment, however, at this time to hear it suggested that it operates to the contrary, and shall wait with some degree of curiosity the elucidation of that idea.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, does the Senator from Utah prefer to present his request for unanimous consent now? If so, I will defer my remarks until that is done. It might be difficult to get a quorum later in the afternoon.

Mr. SMOOT. I prefer at this time to present the request for unanimous consent; but before doing so I wish to say that I have numerous telegrams and many letters from known conservationists from all parts of the country congratulating me most heartily upon reporting this leasing bill to the Senate. Therefore I wish at this time frankly to state that, so far as I am advised, to-day the leading conservationists of the United States have little, if any, objection to the passage of this bill. There may be some; but I only speak of those who have sent me word.

I simply say that because of the statement made by the Senator from Arizona referring to the conservationists.

Now, Mr. President, I send to the desk a proposed unanimous-consent agreement and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 6 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Monday, August 25, 1919, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill, Senate bill 2775, a bill to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 3 o'clock p. m. on said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll, under the rule.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I presume it is in order when a suggestion of that sort is presented to proceed at once to call the roll. If it is not too late, I should like to say that I shall interpose an objection to concluding debate at any time upon this bill. If it will save time and avoid the calling of the roll, I make the suggestion now to that end.

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand the Senator to say that he would object to concluding debate at any time?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; at any time.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I withdraw the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thought the Senator would.

Let me add, Mr. President, while I am on my feet, that my only purpose in making that suggestion now is in order that time may be given to the consideration of the bill that might otherwise be taken up by the call of the roll and in other ways. I think great progress has been made in the consideration of this subject, and that we have before us a bill here that gives promise of legislation at this session. This bill is a wide departure from the position taken by the advocates of the legislation at the conclusion of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and I am encouraged by the improvement which has been made during the time since March in the direction of a better protection of the public interests over the measure that was presented at that time by the committee, the personnel of which is almost entirely the same as it was then—I think there are only four new members upon the committee—to hope that a day or two more given to the consideration of this measure may work out some further improvements.

I wish to commend the committee for the excellent provisions the bill contains. I have, however, some amendments which I wish to offer and which I hope to have considered by the Senate. I understand perfectly well, Mr. President, and everyone ought to understand, that no one at this time of the session would propose amendments or suggest delay in the legislation for a day or for two or three days with any other purpose than that of perfecting the legislation. That is, I want Senators who may have in their minds the thought that perhaps I was the one on this floor who was responsible for the defeat of the bill embodied in the conference report in the closing days of the last session, to understand that my suggestion made at this time is only with the view of getting before Senators all of the facts and all of the arguments that ought to be considered in connection with legislation so far-reaching in its consequences as this proposed measure.

I do not know its significance; but I am just in receipt of a telegram signed by several people in Los Angeles. I know none of them, but they say that the whole West is ablaze against this legislation, and they want time to make protest and to be heard. I repeat, I do not know any of the individuals who signed that telegram, which I will present on the floor, and in regard to which I wish to make some little investigation if I can. They say that there are provisions in this bill that are in the interest of foreign ownership and control of mines. I know that there has been some effort made to guard against that very thing in the bill; but I can not see that we shall especially suffer by not fixing a time for disposing of this [illegible] now, as suggested by the chairman of the committee.

I have always favored leasing legislation in regard to the natural resources of the country, and I only want to see this bill made just as good as it can be made in the public interest, and in saying "in the public interest" I mean in the public interest of the West as well as of the East, looking at it in the largest and broadest way. That is all I want; and I shall be glad to see this measure, when it is perfected, written into law. I say this merely in explanation of the fact that I do not believe the time is at hand just now for putting up the bars on the debate on this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, speaking for myself I have not the slightest desire even to seem to want to push this bill to an undue conclusion. I rather hoped that we might be able to agree on some definite time for voting upon it without preventing full discussion by so doing, for two reasons: In the first place, the whole subject has been intermittently before Congress even since I have had the honor of a seat in this Chamber. I do not believe that any one subject has been so thoroughly debated from every conceivable angle as the so-called leasing policy proposed to be established by the Government and applied to large portions of the public domain. Hence, with the exception of new Members, like my friend the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and some others, I think practically everything has been said that can be urged for and against the proposed method of dealing with the public lands.

In the next place, the experiences which a similar bill encountered during the Sixty-fifth Congress have warned those of us who want to see some legislation effected of the danger of procrastination. In the month of January, 1918, the Senate passed an oil-leasing bill. It went to the House and was there properly referred to the House Committee on the Public Lands, which held hearings for months upon its various provisions and finally reported to the House a measure which, after being passed with amendments, ultimately reached a committee of conference consisting of Members of both Houses, and there it remained without a seeming hope of agreement until the Congress itself was drawing to its statutory end. The conference report reached the Senate, and here a point of order was made against it, which was very properly sustained by the Chair, requiring another conference meeting and another report. That report was presented to the consideration of the Senate during its expiring hours, and it failed of passage because the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and others were not satisfied with its provisions and exercised their constitutional right of opposing it, and did oppose it successfully.

That experience, I think, justifies the reflection that if we are to have any legislation by this Congress upon this subject we should heed the experiences of the last Congress and try to secure its enactment as early as possible during the life of the Congress. Hence I am very much in hopes that we may be able early in the week to vote affirmatively upon this bill or to determine its fate, and its final fate, at this time at least by its rejection. Of course, two or three days will make comparatively little difference, and I am sure from what the Senator from Wisconsin has said that we may be able to consider his amendments and secure a final vote upon the bill before the coming week shall have expired.

Mr. President, while I have the floor let me say a few words upon the general subject of the bill, which I had not intended discussing at all. I have exhausted myself and unquestionably exhausted the patience of my colleagues in previous speeches relating to the policy of the department and of the administration, not alone concerning the subject matter of this bill, but concerning its general policy with regard to the public domain. But the Senate is now honored with a different membership, consisting largely of Senators whose experiences regarding this subject have been academic, if they have had any at all; and it is their attitude upon the subject and their desire for changes in the bill as reported by the committee that must constitute my justification for submitting some additional observations upon it.

Mr. President, I went to the city of Denver in the month of December, 1871. Colorado was then a Territory, comprising less than 40,000 whites, the city of Denver having an estimated population of 7,500. The Territory comprised over 100,000 square miles of domain, practically all of which was public land and most of which was unsurveyed. The pioneers of that day had been drawn to that section of the West largely by the lure of gold and silver, which has been the active cause of community settlements in inhospitable and unknown regions ever since man has had a recorded existence upon the globe. We had no mining law of any consequence then, the act of 1866 being concededly deficient and furnishing comparatively little, if any, inducement to the prospector to ply his vocation.

The next year Congress enacted the law of 1872, which threw all mineral lands of the Government open to exploration by citizens of the United States and those who had declared their intention to become such and provided that the discoverer of a lode should have the right to 1,500 feet of the vein discovered and a piece of ground not exceeding 600 by 1,500 feet in dimensions, together with all other veins, lodes, or ledges apexing within that territory, and conferring upon the States and Territories the power to diminish the size of the location not exceeding 50 feet on each side of the center of the vein. That piece of legislation has contributed more to the settlement of the Rocky Mountain West and of the Pacific West than all the other statutes and policies of the General Government affecting that country combined.

In the first place, it told the citizen of the United States to go upon the public domain and hunt for treasure, and assured him the right to locate and enjoy that treasure should he be successful; and emigration began from all sections of the United States to the great West. It was, Mr. President, a population comprising the best brains and the best blood of the older settlements, and therefore gave us a population alert, intelligent, enterprising, and patriotic. The vast flood of emigration following the successful miner peopled our cities, spread over our plains, conquered all of the adverse conditions of nature, added great Commonwealths to the Union, and contributed and is contributing enormously to the general wealth and prosperity of the country.

This law, Mr. President, was abused, as are all laws which are designed to protect and to benefit honest men and women. Fraudulent mining locations were made by the score and by the hundred and by the thousand, and in some instances patents were issued for such fraudulent locations; but, speaking by and large, the restrictive provisions of that law, coupled with its rigid enforcement, reduced the successful perpetration of these frauds to a minimum. During the course of the progress of the mining history of the West many aggregations of claims were formed, and corporations owned and operated them. In some places like Butte, Mont., and Cripple Creek, Colo., perhaps at Bingham, Utah, and other mining sections of the West, these combinations became very large in size, and, generally speaking, very profitable in operation. Frequently they wielded an industrial and political power not entirely healthful to the communities; but they were the necessary consequence of that physical and geologic condition requring large operation in order to produce profitable results; and, notwithstanding their deficiencies, the general sum of their benefits not only to the West but to the Republic very greatly outweighs the evils and abuses to which they gave rise.

We would have avoided those conditions had it been possible; but it is the order of progress of modern times that combinations will be formed not only by those engaged in manufacture and development, and generally known as capitalists, but also by farmers and workmen in all conditions of life. I never have viewed that tendency with anything but apprehension; but it is here, and it has been here for many years, and as far as I am able to perceive it is likely to remain as a feature of economic and industrial progress, however much we may rail against it, and however needful it may be to impose restrictions upon these combinations.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a suggestion here?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that the view which was finally expressed by Mr. Roosevelt may be the correct economic view, and, so far as it may be so denominated, the correct political view, in dealing with these corporations and big industrial activities? It seems as though, as the Senator has said, the tendency of the times, the economic conditions of this and other countries, lend themselves to large business enterprises. Where you have an income tax, an excess-profits tax, and the system of taxation which obtains in this country and in England and in other European countries, does not the Senator think you can deal pretty effectually with large corporations? And then when in addition to that you have measures such as the Sherman antitrust law, and supervisory measures such as we find in the Federal Trade Commission bill, does not the Senator think that in that way you can curb monopolies and trusts, and prevent the evils which otherwise might exist from unrestrained monopolistic opportunity?

Mr. THOMAS. Well, it may be, Mr. President. My purpose in referring to that situation was not to discuss it, but to admit the fact as the basis of an intelligent consideration of conditions which this bill will encounter no matter what its provisions may be.

These combinations, Mr. President, and especially those affecting other divisions of the public domain—railroad companies, coal companies, land companies, and so forth—have unquestionably sinned against the land laws of the United States, and sinned most grievously. They have not only taken advantage of liberal provisions, but they have perverted them; and in times past, either by tacit or by express understandings and agreements between themselves and the officials of the Government in the city of Washington, they have robbed the public domain and acquired to themselves thousands upon thousands of acres of land of great value, and which should have been restored because of these things to the people of the United States. I do not defend them at all. On the contrary, I was among the first to denounce these conditions and call the attention of the public to the fact that they could not exist without an understanding between the robber and the robbed or the representatives of the robbed, and that unless the laws of the United States as they existed were arbitrarily enforced and their violators properly punished a reaction of public sentiment would be bound to set in, and when it came we would go to the other extreme, to the infinite injury and annoyance of the innocent citizen of the United States who, in obedience to the law, was seeking to obtain the benefits which that law gave him from the public domain. That is precisely what occurred. We have gone to the other extreme, with the result that the little fellow, the prospector, the homesteader, the small coal miner, the modest locator of oil lands, has for some time been regarded as prima facie a scoundrel and a thief, and has been so treated by pretty nearly every division of the Department of the Interior. The result is that it is about as difficult for a man, however upright and honest he may be, to obtain from the Government of the United States any sort of a claim as it is for a camel to go through the eye of a needle.

I can illustrate that by the experience of two women schoolteachers in the city of Denver, who some years ago made their locations upon agricultural lands near the Utah boundary upon the supposition that they could acquire lands of substantial value by complying with the statutes concerning residence. Those two women have been driven from pillar to post; they have been sent from bureau to commission and from commission back to bureau. They have tried to comply with every requirement only to be confronted with others. They began their unfortunate attempt in 1913, and are to-day further away from a recognition of their claims than when they started.

They are honest, hard-working women. They expected to secure this land simply by living upon it; but the various obstacles which bureaucracy has placed between them and their title have caused them to incur an expense of over $4,000 up to this time, and now they write me that they propose to abandon their efforts, being conscious of the fact, and made painfully conscious of it by the action of the Government officials, that their Government exists to prevent instead of to permit its citizens to acquire title to the public lands.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator permit me to inquire for what purpose the department wished to conserve the land which these poor women wanted?

Mr. THOMAS. In this particular class of lands the virus of conservation has not yet actually entered. It is there indirectly because of the nonoperation of department machinery.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I did not know but that they were conserving it for the great-grandchildren of these claimants.

Mr. THOMAS. It is certain that unless conditions change these ladies will not receive their patent from the Government until their grandchildren are themselves parents of children.

This, of course, may not be a typical instance, but I know that the experience of every western Senator here will bear me out in the statement that one of the most difficult things now confronting the homesteader is the obtaining of a patent, and, I might add, one of the most expensive things. It is due more to the reaction from the profligate extravagance and robbery of the public domain by the railway and coal companies and other combinations during the last decade of the last century and the first three or four years of the present century than to anything else.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator ought to state and put into the RECORD in connection with the illustration which he has just given that in all probability the arid land to which these two women were trying to obtain title, if a person had the title, would not at the time they entered upon it have brought in the market more than two or three dollars per acre.

Mr. THOMAS. No one acquainted with values in the West would pay that much for it. Of course, all the best lands have been secured, and a homesteader now acquiring a piece of land, even when he gets a patent, is at the beginning and not at the end of his troubles, because he must then make it cultivable, which is an extremely complicated problem, especially where irrigation is necessary.

The conditions to which I have referred also gave birth to what is popularly called the policy of conservation, a policy which sanely and wisely directed should commend itself to every thinking man and woman in this country—a policy which, through laws enacted for its wise operation, would unquestionably receive the support, and the enthusiastic support, of the vast population now occupying the States of Montana, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Nevada, Utah, Idaho, Washington, and Oregon. I should perhaps say that during the first stages of its consideration it was as popular there as it was anywhere else. No man haled its advent more enthusiastically than myself, no man followed it more faithfully, until it became plain that its purpose was not conservation, unless that term was the equivalent of a denial of the right of private ownership by the people of the United States of the public domain, and unless it meant also an approval of the reservation of countless millions of acres of public land under the theory of a conservation which assumes that the withdrawal of lands from public entry is a benefit and not a detriment to the people of the United States.

When you consider that in the States of Utah, Colorado, Arizona, and New Mexico from 35 to 45 per cent of our territory under existing regulations and reservations never can pass into private ownership; that it is under the dominion of a central power represented here in Washington, thousands of miles away; that it is not subject to local laws and regulations; that it contributes not a dollar to the support of State and municipal governments; and that it must so remain until public opinion changes in this country, one can easily understand why the people of the West, with here and there an exception, are opposed to conservation. One can well understand why people in the East, living in States unburdened by such conditions, States which were once public-land States also, but whose lands have passed entirely into private ownership, can not appreciate the conditions which confront us. It is all very easy to understand how a Senator from Massachusetts, whose ancestors drove the Indians from that country and possessed themselves of all their land, it is very easy to understand how a Senator from some other eastern State whose ancestors were not at all concerned about their well-being and who were, nevertheless, better off because of such unconcern, can insist upon imposing on the people of the West, upon the theory that all the people own all of the public land in the country, conditions which are obnoxious to us and in some instances intolerant.

Mr. President, did you ever see the forestry book of regulations which are made applicable to the administration of our forest reserves? It is about twice as big and bulky as the pending treaty, and it contains provisions covering all conceivable conditions, with the compliance of every one of which every man must content himself when he enters that sacred domain. It is the quintessence of modern bureaucracy and has as much to do with the creation and continuance of a feeling of discontent and outrage as any other one element of land administration.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator permit me to give one little illustration along the line he has been speaking?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. In my State in particular the forest reserves are something over 11,000,000 acres, three are four times the size of the State of Massachusetts. A man living quite a little distance from a city had some horses to dispose of and he wanted to sell them. Having to go 50 or 60 miles to find the manager of the forest reserve, he took the dangerous liberty of driving his horses through the forest reserve over the trail to get to the nearest town, and suffered considerable inconvenience in the prosecution that resulted over a violation of the rules and regulations of the forest reserves.

Not only that, but in the county of Graham, several years ago, the department made the greater part of that great county a forest reserve, the celebrated Graham Peak, a great mountain, being included therein. Some miners had been working on that mountain side for years before the reservation was created. They built their little cabin and had their kitchen and their bed. The forest reserve rangers came along and thought they needed it. Therefore, without consulting the miners, they simply told them to get out of there. They threw all their things out of the house. I believe they kept the stove, because they needed that. They proceeded to drive those men out of the mine they had been working in for years because it was in a forest reservation, and the ground upon which they had built their little cabin to conveniently work their mine in that particular location was more valuable for timber than it was for occupancy by those miners. I may say in justification of the authorities at that time that I brought the matter with some unction before them and did succeed in having the trespassing gentlemen removed, but that is the only case where it has been done that I have known in the whole management of the forest reserves in the Western States.

Mr. THOMAS. And the Senator, to get relief for his constituents, had to apply to the head of a bureau 3,000 miles away from home.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; and who knew nothing about it.

Mr. THOMAS. Conservation and reservation are synonymous terms evidently in the minds of the average eastern conservationist. Of course, these men had it in mind that it should be kept for the benefit of some citizen in the year 2149, or perhaps his most remote descendant, who, of course, is entitled to some but not to all consideration in our administration of the public lands.

If it had not been for the law of 1872 I am satisfied that the Great American Desert, as it was called in the geographies when I was a boy, would be a desert still. I am confident that if the modern policy of conservation had been inaugurated in the early seventies, or immediately after the war, its paralyzing and depressing and retrogressive effect upon the great West would have made it extremely difficult for America either to be able to protect herself or to have rendered such efficient aid in the Great War of the World, because it is not the Geological Bureau of Washington, it is not the other bureaus which perform efficient service here which should be credited with the discovery of the enormous deposits of minerals of all kinds, but the individual who, armed with a hope of profit and sustained by the statutory promise of his Government, risks all his money, his life, his family, his health, everything in those inhospitable wilds of nature where all her great mineral resources are for the most part deposited, has discovered them, wrested them from their hiding places, and compelled their contribution to the general wealth of mankind. And so with oil.

Mr. President, the so-called placer mining law—also a part of the act of 1872, and which gave the right of location to not to exceed 20 acres per man of all placer mineral ground in the West—has been made applicable to other forms of deposit which the energy and the industry of the prospector has also discovered, but which can not be included under the provisions of the act. That placer law, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has said, was not applicable, strictly speaking, to any such locations as those with which this bill must deal, but under an act of Congress it has been made especially applicable thereto. Some years ago certain men of experience in the matter of oil deposits and oil formations became convinced that oil existed in certain parts of the United States which up to that time, while producing many other things, had produced no oil. Those men were particularly impressed with the apparent geologic conditions in California and in Wyoming and they went to those sections of the country and made investigations, followed by locations, first in California.

I do not know, Mr. President, whether you have ever been in the section of California where oil in quantity was first discovered, but a coyote has to carry his rations with him if he expects to stay overnight anywhere upon the Mojave Desert and that section of California lying immediately to the east of it. These men, however, went there—that was some years before the universal automobile age—and carried with them everything essential to the preservation and continuance of animal existence, built roads, laid water pipes, then sunk their shafts and discovered oil. What geologic bureau, what paid Government prospector—if such a thing can be imagined—what impulse or influence except the impulse or influence of gain, encouraged, and properly encouraged, by the Government, would ever have driven men into such inhospitable regions, impelled them to expend their money and their time, and incur all of the dangers which inhere in such climatic conditions, except that they knew and were told by the Government that their successful exploitation would be followed by a recognition of their locations?

About that time the principle of conservation became very popular, and in some sections of the country extremely fashionable. In 1907, 1908, and 1909 the same class of individuals, going through hardships not quite so extreme, accomplished the same results in Wyoming. Immediately, the Government of the United States, through President Taft, issued a withdrawal order by which practically all known oil lands were withdrawn from location. The President himself said he did not think he had the power to do it, or at least that there was a question as to his power. I might add that the Supreme Court subsequently sustained him. But the fact is that from that good day on limitations were placed upon oil development which if permitted would have solved the problem of the oil supply of this country, as the people if permitted to-day to continue oil development under some sort of legislative restrictions and conditions would give us all the oil that we need.

In 1910 the so-called Pickett bill was enacted, recognizing the validity of the reservation of President Taft and going a little further and giving some validity and standing to bona fide locations made between that time and the date of the bill. Of course, the law was designed—it may not have been so construed afterwards, but it was designed—to be in harmony with the existing law relating to the discovery and location of oil claims.

Of course, a great many dishonest men, adventurers, speculators, and the unscrupulous joined in the tide of immigrants to these places, and they plied their trade as best they could. That is an unavoidable condition in all departments of human endeavor, especially such as promise big returns. The way to guard against it, of course, is the enactment and the enforcement of stringent regulations. But, Mr. President, every man making a location, no matter how much money he may have expended upon it, whatever his bona fides may have been, almost without exception has been treated and sometimes has been branded as a scoundrel, the modern theory being that no honest man will or can have anything to do with an oil location on the public domain. All proposed legislation of the departments—the Department of the Interior, perhaps, excepted—has been based upon that hypothesis.

The result has been that many a man has been ruined—men just as honest and upright as the most honest and upright conservationist in the world—by the negative operation of a governmental policy toward him and in defiance of rights to which he was entitled under the statutes of his country. It is that class of men with which I am concerned, and I know that there are multitudes of them; I know that they are in the great majority; and I think every person will agree with me that the Government of the United States should be the last agency to brand any honest citizen owing allegiance to it with even the suspicion of fraud or dishonesty.

The locator, however, who has been trying to get a patent, and whose location antedates Mr. Taft's order of September, 1909, has been subjected to an ordeal much worse, and far more difficult to escape without injury to himself, than the ancient one which forced the accused or suspected person through a passage lined with red-hot pieces of iron.

I am trying to give a history—an imperfect one, if you please—of the change of conditions as they were and ought to have been to those which now confront us. About the time of the Taft withdrawal order two naval reserves were created, the purpose being to conserve oil for the Navy. They were carved out of the country with cheerful disregard of the rights of locators within them, naval reserve No. 1 being conspicuously inclusive of a large number of bona fide, profitable locations containing oil. Of course, the reserve would not have been made otherwise. That injected the Navy into the general situation, although it should not have had that effect.

No man has a higher opinion of the Secretary of the Navy than I; no man has defended him upon the floor of the Senate in times past more earnestly than I; no man believes more thoroughly in his uprightness and conscientiousness than I; but the Secretary of the Navy, because of these reservations, long ago identified himself with the opponents of this character of legislation, and was able, with the cooperation of the former Attorney General of the United States, to usurp and exercise the functions of the Interior Department. I am not questioning their good faith or the integrity of their views, but the result has been that a combination of great departments has been exercised to prevent the recognition up to this time of any sort of right on the part of these people, who have been asking for nothing but justice for years and years.

One result of this unfortunate condition has been the practical loss to the Government of the United States of naval reserve No. 1. I wish the Navy no harm, but I can not help saying that it served them right, for time after time propositions of compromise were made by those who were interested in bona fide locations within that district which, through the exchange of other lands for the lands there involved, would have given them free title and conserved the oil reserves for the use of the Navy; but the obstinacy of the department made that impossible, with the result that the court has sustained the bona fides of the locators, and the title of the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. to large portions of land has also been judicially confirmed.

Whether the same thing will happen to the other two reserves, one of which is in Wyoming, I do not know; but I do know—at least I am creditably informed—that oil taken from the reserve in Wyoming will cost about three times more to lay down on either the Atlantic or the Pacific coast than oil which can be obtained from private sources for supplying those localities. It may be well to preserve it until the year 7894, when perhaps the use of oil as a fuel for the Navy will be supplanted by some synthetic compound which the genius of man in the interval will have devised; I do not know,

Mr. President, it is said that we must conserve the interests of the people of the United States; be it so. It is said we must safeguard the patrimony of posterity; be it so. But in doing that let us consider two fundamentals: First, justice to the men whose only offense is a compliance with the law, and, second, consideration for the interests and welfare of the people who are now on earth and who are suffering from discontents and difficulties innumerable, not the least of which is the enormous cost of an essential element in our modern life which this bill when enacted, if it ever is, will serve to relieve.

I am not in favor of this bill. I can not give my sanction to a single section of it. I am utterly—I was going to say irreconcilably, but I can not help myself, in view of the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States—I am utterly and irretrievably, in so far as my mental faculties of protest are concerned, opposed to the system. I do not like to think of Uncle Sam as a great big landlord, an absentee landlord at that, doling out leasehold interests to his children, collecting rent from them, and providing for its collection by the appointment of another multitude of officeholders to examine their books, to keep tab upon their activities, to watch their bank accounts, and to invoke the law or the regulations against them whenever any one of such officeholders shall come to the conclusion that the terms and conditions of the lease are not being strictly observed. I do not believe in landlordism, whether it manifests itself in private affairs or in public affairs.

We entered upon the leasing system in the early days of the Republic, about 100 years ago. We applied it to the lead mines along the Mississippi River on either side. The people rebelled against it, and properly so. It became not only unpopular but extremely unsuccessful, and was abandoned for that reason, as, in my judgment, this scheme will be abandoned. But it is all we can get; it is this or nothing.

Every locator under this bill, however sound his title, is required to surrender and abandon his location as a condition to his acquiring a lease to the thing that he equitably owns, and he must himself pay tribute to the extent of not less than 12½ per cent and not to exceed 25 per cent—and if the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is adopted, probably 75 per cent—of the proceeds of an oil well in a deposit of oil which he is entitled to the credit of having discovered.

When I was a boy I heard a story of a woman who was always afraid of burglars, and one night she woke up her husband and in a frenzied whisper informed him that a burglar was under the bed. "Well," the old man said, "he will come out in a few minutes, honey; then we will let him hunt, and if he finds anything we will take it away from him." [Laughter.] That is about the policy which has been followed by the departments and by administrations, Democratic and Republican, since the good year of our Lord 1905; and, to use a common expression, it is the people of the West who get it in the neck every time.

A most fortunate public-land State is Texas. Texas came into the Union as the owner of all the public lands in her dominions; and, fortunately for her, the Secretary of the Navy and the Attorney General of the United States can not interfere and place shackles upon her power of development or the enjoyment of her resources by her citizens. The result is that the great oil activities of the day are now centered in Texas and in those portions of California represented by land grants from the old Mexican and Spanish Governments, recognized in the treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo. That is a hard thing to say of the Government, Mr. President, but it is the fact nevertheless; and the only decent policy, the only really successful policy, the only equitable policy, in my judgment, which the United States could follow with regard to its public domains is to convey them to the respective States of the Union. I know it would break the hearts of about 100,000 faithful employees in the city of Washington and distributed over the country, now thoroughly organized and demanding increases of pay, but it would subserve the purposes of the communities where these lands are located far better than any other system that could be devised by the wit of man, and, Mr. President, would at once do away with that system of bureaucracy which has grown up in these departments and whose rules and regulations have become so rank and luxuriant that no man now, however good his claim, can get a patent without waiting for years, and then expending a great deal more money than he can afford to expend.

Why, I think 5 or 10 per cent of my correspondence comes from poor people in my section of the State who for years have had claims in Washington for land entries and applications for patents, and who are despairing of obtaining that relief or those rulings which are necessary, and which must precede the making of the entry and the securing of a certificate of purchase. Those things would not take place, or at least they would not immediately occur, if the public lands in the State of Colorado and in the State of New Mexico and other States were conveyed, under proper conditions regarding monopoly, to the different States of the Union; but that, Mr. President, is out of the question.

The average conservationist—I will not say it applies to all of them—is very much concerned about conserving other people, but when it comes to a personal application of the doctrine he is not so enthusiastic. I believe the gentleman who claims to be the great progenitor, the father of conservation, is the Hon. Gifford Pinchot, at one time chief adviser to President Roosevelt, forester of the United States, and one of the founders and leaders of the late lamented Progressive Party. He it was who discovered that the way to conserve was to reserve, and that the way to develop was to keep everything petrified and stagnant. To him, so far as his actions are concerned, the American Indian, in the days preceding or accompanying the pioneer life of the United States, was the ideal conservationist of the world, for he not only preserved everything for future generations, but he did not care a picayune about it himself.

Mr. President, we should imagine that a gentleman inspired by such lofty altruism, so sincerely devoted to the cause of posterity, and so abhorrent of anything that would even smack of exploitation would be in a class by himself, and until a comparatively recent date I have pictured men like Mr. Gifford Pinchot as being holier than myself and being possessed of a loftier citizenship and more thoroughly devoted to the principles of the Progressive Party than I could hope to be. During the discussion of the Saulsbury bill, however, a little incident occurred which gave me a good deal of sorrow, and which indicated that, so far as this gentleman's personal belongings and opportunities were concerned, they were exempted from his general doctrines of conservation. We all recall the scene in Richelieu where the great cardinal draws the charmed circle of the church around his niece for her protection and thereby gives her immunity. I am afraid that the Hon. Gifford Pinchot has attempted to fulfill the rôle both of cardinal and of niece and has drawn that sort of a circle around himself and some of his property belongings. I am impelled to that conclusion by some letters, copies of which were some time ago placed in my hands, and I have determined, after prayerful consideration, to take advantage of the first opportunity offering itself to read them into the RECORD.

During the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 152) to prevent rent profiteering in the District of Columbia the name of Gifford Pinchot was brought into the discussion in a colloquy between Senator Saulsbury, who was addressing the Senate, and Senator THOMAS, who inquired if Mr. Pinchot was referred to by Senator Saulsbury, who had not named him. The discussion occurred on May 6, 1918, and will be found on page 6101 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD (65th Cong., 2d sess.).

An investigation of the subject discloses that Gifford Pinchot, on November 24, 1915, rented, through his agent, Horace H. Westcott, to Rev. Walden Myer, a dwelling house at 1622 N Street NW., Washington, D. C., for 10 months from the 1st of December, 1915, at $200 per month. This lease was drawn on a printed form, and a clause was typewritten into the lease giving the tenant the privilege of renewing for one year from the expiration of the lease at $2,400 per year.

The lease was renewed July 27, 1916, for one year on the same terms except as to renewal. On June 1, 1917, the lease was further extended for one year from October 1, 1917, on the same terms and conditions except as to renewal, and with the following proviso:

> And that the party of the first part shall have the privilege of canceling the within lease, should the within-described premises be sold, by giving three months' notice from the next succeeding rent day to the party of the second part.

This condition was signed by Westcott, the agent, and Myer, the tenant.

Miss Myer, who represented her brother in matters of correspondence with Mr. Pinchot, stated that Mr. Pinchot attempted to put them out "without legal foundation." Now, the Senate should be reminded, or perhaps it is not necessary, that it was just about that time when the dollar-a-year men invaded the city of Washington, and were very anxious to secure quarters for themselves and families during their stay in Washington; that these gentlemen were, speaking largely, men of independent means and incomes, capable, therefore, of paying generous rentals, and awfully good picking for the landlords and house-owners of the city of Washington.

The trouble over the house began when the secretary to Mr. Westcott wrote to Rev. Myer on September 1, 1917, that Mr. Pinchot was going to exercise his option to cancel the lease. To this letter Miss Myer replied for her brother, under date of September 4, 1917, asking the name of the purchaser. This was before Miss Myer received a letter from Gifford Pinchot, dated at Washington, D. C., September 3, 1917, which letter was addressed to her at Bar Harbor, Me., and is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 3, 1917.

MISS GERTRUDE MYER,
Edgemere, Bar Harbor, Me.

MY DEAR MISS MYER: Mr. Westcott may have written you that I have given him notice that I desire to take advantage of the clause of the lease which permits me to take possession of the house now leased to you upon three months' notice in case of sale. The circumstances are these:

In order to get additional money for war relief, Mrs. Pinchot and I have decided to rent the house we are living in now.

That is a great, big house, you know. If I owned a house like that and were able to run it and maintain it, I might be a conservationist myself. [Laughter.]

A number of offers have been made, and I am told by the real estate people there will be no difficulty whatever in carrying out this part of the plan. We desire to spend the winter in the house you now occupy.

Just here I am informed that the tenant was a man by the name of Vanderlip, who was expected to take the large house, and who, in popular estimate at least, is supposed to be able to pay a very fair and generous rental if he wants to.

I realize perfectly that the right to terminate the lease is dependent on sale, and if necessary, in order to be legally correct, I have arranged to sell the house to Mrs. Pinchot for cash.

[Laughter.]

All this is the formal part of the matter. What I am writing now to say is that I regret exceedingly the inconvenience we shall be causing you in making this decision, and that I should be glad to do anything I can to minimize that inconvenience. It is possible, under the circumstances, you would be willing to allow us to cancel the lease and have possession of the house earlier than December 1, when the lease would legally terminate, and it would be a very great convenience to us if you could manage to do so. We are planning to make certain alterations in the house, and it would naturally assist us very greatly if you would permit us to do so. In case you should be willing and yet should find it inconvenient to move your furniture, would you permit us to guarantee its safety and assemble it under lock and key in certain rooms of the house, where it would remain safe and untouched?

I want to say how sorry I am that circumstances make it necessary for us to inconvenience you and how greatly we should appreciate any help you may be willing to give us toward getting settled as early as possible.

Sincerely, yours, GIFFORD PINCHOT.

Strange to say, that affecting appeal was not sufficiently persuasive to get satisfactory results, because the lady at once replied from Bar Harbor, on the 6th of September, as follows:

BAR HARBOR, ME., September 6, 1917.

GIFFORD PINCHOT, Esq.,
Washington.

MY DEAR MR. PINCHOT: I have received your letter written September 3.

My brother, Rev. Walden Myer, had received a letter from Miss Harriet Holther, secretary to Mr. Westcott, saying that you wished to cancel the lease of 1622 N Street, to which he replied that he could not surrender the house or allow the cancellation of the lease. My brother's views are mine.

I appreciate that in writing to me you desire to explain the matter and give me, as the woman of the house, some reason for taking away from me a place I regard as my home. I assure you it is impossible for me to find at this late time a suitable home, and this is why my brother and I took the precaution of securing 1622 N Street last November for the coming year, as well as to make some improvements for our own comfort. At the time I inquired of Mr. Westcott the significance of some words, which I seem to recall were afterwards embodied in the signed renewal, relating to a termination of the lease in case of sale. He stated that the need for some clause of the kind was that our occupancy of the little house might block the sale of the entire square, adding that it was a proposition involving over $4,000,000, and that we need have no anxiety about being compelled to move out. It was upon this understanding that we relinquished houses we then had in view and which we can not now obtain. I have spent much time, thought, and money in making this house a home for my brother and myself. We certainly never would have consented to the renewal of the lease of the house upon the understanding you might take it back for whatever purpose you might wish.

Even were a sale of the entire square to take place, three months would be a very short time for us to find a home and furnish it. In this connection I may add with reference to your suggestion to cancel the lease and let you have possession before December 1 that such a course, with its attendant anxiety and nervous strain, its effort of finding another house and furnishing it, and the fatigue of moving out of this one, would seriously impair my health. This I know my physician would confirm.

Last spring, and, in fact, for three years, I have been actively engaged in war relief, which I wish to continue this winter, and which the burden you propose to lay upon me would utterly prevent.

I feel when you realize what you have asked you will be considerate enough not to pursue the matter further.

My brother unites with me in hoping this letter fully explains why we can not comply with your request.

Sincerely, yours,
GERTRUDE WALDEN MYER.

P. S.—My brother has read this letter, and he wishes me to say that the above are his views. He does not agree that there is any clause in the lease or its renewal that under the circumstances would enable you to cancel it, and he can only affirm his statements made in his letter to Mr. Westcott's secretary of September 4.

G. W. MYER.
O. K.: WALDEN MYER.

Miss Myer had consulted Walter C. Clephane, a prominent attorney in Washington, as shown by the following copy of a letter from Mr. Clephane to her. Mr. Clephane advised Miss Myer that Mr. Pinchot had no legal right to put them out.

[Cable address, Clephane, Washington.]

WALTER C. CLEPHANE,
ATTORNEY AND COUNSELLOR AT LAW,
Wilkins Building, 1512 H Street, Washington, D. C., May 17, 1918.

MISS GERTRUDE MYER,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MISS MYER: When your controversy with Mr. Gifford Pinchot was brought to my attention last fall and you submitted to me the correspondence, together with the lease and extension thereof relating to your tenancy of 1622 N Street NW., I then advised you that in my judgment you had an absolute right to remain in possession of the property leased from Mr. Pinchot, and that Mr. Pinchot had no rights, legal, equitable, or moral, to dispossess you. I have never seen any reason to change my opinion as then expressed.

Yours, very sincerely,
WALTER C. CLEPHANE.

On the 25th of September the sale to Mrs. Pinchot having evidently failed for some reason, possibly because they could not agree upon terms, Mr. Pinchot addressed Miss Myer, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
September 25, 1917.

MISS GERTRUDE W. MYER,
1622 N Street, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MISS MYER: After very full consideration of the matter of your house, and with the knowledge that Mrs. Pinchot and I would have had the complete and unassailable legal right to do as we had contemplated doing, we came to the conclusion that such action would not be fair to you in view of what you had expected when you signed the renewal of the lease. Accordingly we have decided for this reason not to rent our house for this year, since it would not be possible to find another place than the one you are in. The decision has only just been reached, and I hasten to notify you.

Sincerely, yours, GIFFORD PINCHOT.

I find here a note that this gentleman owns three dwelling houses on a triangular-shaped lot bounded by Rhode Island Avenue, Seventeenth and N Streets, and Scott Circle, as follows:

Nos. 1615 and 1617 (lot 800) Rhode Island Avenue is Pinchot's residence, and is assessed at	$82,600
No. 1619 Rhode Island Avenue (lot 801) is assessed at	37,300
No. 1622 N Street (lot 802) rented to Rev. Myer, is assessed at	21,600

Mr. President, it was perhaps very ungracious and very unladylike for Miss Myer to have intruded a successful legal objection to the wish entertained by this gentleman that he might increase his revenues in order to increase those of the Red Cross and other commendable enterprises, but it would indicate that perhaps that was not the entire and controlling reason for the desire to change. Milking a rich New York banker to the tune of $2,500 a month, or such a trifle, for a larger house in one sense is conservation, because it requires the expenditure of the money of an outsider in the city of Washington, helps local business, and encourages landlords; but, without pretending to know the truth of it, my information is that the big house was let just the same. I have no knowledge with regard to what was done with the money, but I am willing to venture the opinion that it has been conserved.

Mr. President, this may seem trifling in connection with the importance of this bill, but I confess when I think of so many good, honest people in my State who, instead of violating any statute, have sought to comply with their every requirement, who have incurred obligations, who have secured possession of valuable property, who are entitled to the consideration of the Government as a mere matter of justice, and when I hear them condemned by the conservationists of the city of Washington as fraudulent, dishonest, and unconscionable, I must be pardoned if I show sufficient ordinary human feeling to call attention to the conduct of some men who seem to have violated the good, safe, old maxim that one should not throw stones who himself lives in a glass house.

I have talked, Mr. President, much longer than I had intended upon the bill, and perhaps I have said as little about it as is customary in senatorial discussion. I certainly have not attempted to discuss it in detail. I am for the bill because I can not help myself. I am for the bill because it is the only thing that justice can wring from this Congress. It is the only thing the approval of which we can expect upon the part of the Executive. It is the only thing which stands between a good many honest people of the West and bankruptcy. It is the only thing under whose provisions the oil reserves of the West can be developed and the oil itself added to the constantly increasing stream of demand. It is the only source, in fact, to which we can look for an increasing supply of an element which in these days is perhaps more essential to the material well-being and progress of the Nation than anything else, unless it be the item of coal.

We have been defeated in every attempt heretofore to secure some sort of legislation under which measurable terms of relief could be vouchsafed to those who need it and who must have it very soon if it is to be of any benefit to them. It is the only thing, Mr. President, about which both Houses may be able to agree, if the experiences of the last Congress be any guide whatever. The Government virtually says, "Take this or take nothing." The Supreme Court of the United States has sustained the power of withdrawal and has gone so far in recognizing the power of the Government of the United States over the disposition of its public domain as to make the whims of the departments, crystallized into legislation, its governing basis.

I am free to say that I do not believe the bill will yield as much relief as many of its advocates hope for. I am greatly afraid they will be disappointed. I know that it will require a large number of employees to make its provisions effective, or at least to go through the motions of trying to make it effective.

I know that its administration will be burdened with a very large item of expense. But, knowing all these things, having asked for bread, we are in a position where we must either take a stone or go unrelieved.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have not had the opportunity and it has not been my good fortune to listen to all the able address of the Senator from Colorado, but I was in hopes that he would emphasize one of the reasons why we people of the West, who have had experience in these lines, object to the bureaucratic administration of the leasing system. Is not the objection of the Senator based largely upon the objection which I entertain, founded upon experience, that it is not so much or not at all, I may say, that the people of the West object to paying to the United States Government a portion or a percentage of whatever may be gotten out of the ground as it is the reservation under bureaucratic administration that we object to? As must necessarily be the case so long as there is discretion left in the handling of these resources to the Department of the Interior here in Washington, without respect to who may be the Secretary of the Interior at the time, it is worth almost as much as a man's life is worth to attempt to deal with the department or to develop those resources.

Mr. THOMAS. I did refer to some of the bureaucratic aspects of the situation. I did not treat it, however, along all the lines suggested by the Senator from New Mexico. I think it is perfectly true, as he has suggested, that it is not the payment of the tribute that galls, but the fact that it is required and will be enforced under conditions that are peculiarly irritating.

Mr. FALL. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I had in mind a recent experience which the people of the West have had, where the Congress of the United States sought to give us some relief in the disposition of the surface of the land so that people might live on it. Under the old homestead law of 160 acres the department was finally persuaded to a realization, to some extent at any rate, of the fact that 160 acres of land in the remaining portion of the public-land area are not sufficient for a homestead for anyone; and therefore the Congress of the United States passed the 640-acre grazing-land homestead act. I had in mind the administration of that act as it is going on now in my State, in which there are some twenty-odd million acres of land belonging to the public domain, and, as we supposed, subject to homestead entry under the 640-acre act. When the act came to be administered we found this interpretation placed upon it by the department in Washington.

I think I am safe in saying that two-thirds of the applications, numbering something like 5,000, in my State for homestead entry of 640 acres were rejected upon the ground that it was impossible to make a living on the 640 acres, and the applicants were sent back. They were qualified homestead entrymen, and they were sent back to the 160 acres under the old law upon the same land and were notified that while their application for 640 acres was rejected because they could not make a living on it, they could select 160 acres out of the 640 and get a title to it by complying with the law.

Mr. THOMAS. I was not aware of that fact, but it does not surprise me a particle. Of course that is an instance, perhaps an extreme instance, of the liberty which the departments and bureaus take with statutes of the United States when it comes to their administration.

Mr. FALL. It illustrates the difficulty we always find in that respect.

Mr. THOMAS. And the probabilities are that the same experience will confront this bill when it becomes a law.

Mr. FALL. Precisely; I have no doubt of it in the world.

Mr. THOMAS. I am prepared to believe that every remaining yard of red tape, and God knows there are lots of it left in the city of Washington, will be wrapped around this bill, that it will be so swathed with construction and regulation and destruction and application and misapplication and reference of lessees and applicants to first one and then another official, until the man who finally gets his lease will not be able to recognize its features. I am afraid so.

Mr. FALL. I have no doubt of it. I entertain the same fear.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope it will not be the case. I want to say that my statement is not intended to be any reflection whatever upon the present Secretary of the Interior. I recognize the limitations under which he has been trying to operate. I recognize the fact that he has, at times at least, been only the nominal head of the Interior Department, its functions being directed and dictated by the late Attorney General of the United States and the Secretary of the Navy. We have a new Attorney General now, or I hope we will have very soon duly confirmed, and I indulge the hope that the Secretary of the Interior will be permitted to execute this law if he wants to do so. If he does, then I feel reasonably sure that, while it will not be free from all the bureaucratic applications to which all leases are subject, it will be fairly well administered.

Mr. FALL. Let me state another instance of our experience. During the last two or three sessions of Congress there has been before this body, in one form or another, proposed legislation such as has been suggested for the last 25 years, and has often passed one or the other branch of Congress, to throw open on the Indian reserves in the United States the mineral lands which the Indians themselves will not use.

Mr. THOMAS. That is conservation.

Mr. FALL. Exactly. The department, of course, knowing that this legislation was pending, that it had been passed by one branch or the other of Congress repeatedly during the last two or three years, apparently took no notice of it whatsoever. It finally became a law, possibly two months ago, and as yet no regulations have been adopted nor can the department be persuaded under insistence to adopt any regulations of any kind or character under which that law can be put into effect, although it is specific in its terms.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. KING. Will it not be a good idea to append an amendment to this bill compelling the Secretary of the Interior, within 30 days, to promulgate regulations under which mineral lands on Indian reservations may be thus thrown open?

Mr. THOMAS. If you do, it will be construed out of existence.

Mr. FALL. Yes; it would be either construed out of existence or it would receive such opposition in the House or in the White House that I am afraid we would not even get what is provided in the pending bill. So I do not know what we are to do. We people of the West are simply taking what we can get, and hoping in some way that we may be allowed to handle for the benefit of all the world as well as for ourselves the resources which are lying dormant in our States.

Mr. THOMAS. There must be a change in these conditions; otherwise we will be compelled, or our posterity will be compelled, to conclude that this last war was fought to make the world safe for bureaucracy.

Mr. KING. I have been greatly interested in the strong presentation made by the Senator from Colorado regarding the development of the West and the obstacles interposed by Government officials and departments and bureaus to the acquisition by bona fide citizens of agricultural as well as mineral lands. His historical narrative is illuminating and, as I believe, correctly states the facts.

It is to be regretted that there has been and still is so much misapprehension in various parts of the country with respect to the public lands of the United States and the manner by which titles to portions of the same have been obtained. The great West before settlement was divided between deserts and mountains. Shifting sands and alkali plains and unwatered and sterile wastes constituted a great part of the public-land States west of the Missouri River. Mountains upon which there is scarcely any vegetation and which in the main are devoid of timber constitute the most of the territory acquired by the United States through the treaty of Guadaloupe-Hildago. A great portion of the lands of the Dakotas, Montana, and Wyoming are of a similar character.

As the result of a propaganda which ignored the facts and resulted from a frenzied hysteria, many people of the United States were led to believe that the people of the West were trespassers, and had fraudulently obtained title to the lands which they occupied. These propagandists knew that they were misrepresenting the patriotic and industrious people who were reclaiming by their sacrifices and struggles the desert wastes and were building prosperous towns and cities and preparing Commonwealths for the glories of statehood and competent to assume their share of the responsibilities incident to the maintenance of the Union and the principles of this great Republic. Upon desert lands possessing no value, men and women, with a courage rarely equaled and never surpassed, entered, and after lives of toil and struggle they built modest homes and transmuted the deserts and refractory lands into fertile fields and productive farms. To develop mines and obtain gold and silver and other metals found in the earth was an undertaking that called for sacrifice of the severest character. The absurd view is entertained by many who reside in the East that the public lands of the West are an inexhaustible fountain of wealth; that without effort or toil or the expenditure of money millions and, indeed, billions of dollars are to be found; that the precious metals can be shoveled from the surface of the mountains; and all other classes of minerals and metals can be obtained without cost or labor. The facts are that perhaps more money is put into the ground in efforts to discover minerals than is taken from the ground. For every mining property that has yielded dividends, I feel safe in asserting there are a thousand that not only produced no dividends but involved losses to the owners aggregating millions of dollars. For every oil-producing claim found upon the public domain there are hundreds, if not thousands, that were barren, and resulted in serious financial losses, blasted hopes to hundreds of individuals, and in many instances penury, wasted lives, and death. Unfortunately, as the Senator from Colorado has so clearly indicated, too often there has been an administration of the public-land laws that was oppressive and hateful to liberty-loving and independent and self-respecting people. There is some sort of an influence that takes possession of many who find places in departments and bureaus and other Government agencies that leads them to tyrannous and oppressive conduct and to the adoption and enforcement of bureaucratic methods that are harsh and arbitrary and utterly at variance with the spirit and genius of republican institutions.

Many of the officials who have held places in the Interior Department, and many of the representatives and agents of this department who have operated in the public-land States, have treated the West as if it were a stepchild, and they have interposed every possible obstacle to efforts made by bona fide applicants to obtain title to public lands. Instead of encouraging locations of the mineral lands and the settlement of the agricultural lands and the development of the West and the building up of the sterile and waste places, they have sought to prevent titles passing; indeed, they have endeavored to prevent the occupation for legitimate and proper purposes of any part of the public domain.

The Senator from Colorado has alluded to two women from his State, who have for years been seeking title to homestead entries made by them. The lands which they entered were worthless when they made their entries. Doubtless they have made improvements thereon, and if title had been obtained would have made the lands valuable and productive. They have, as the Senator has stated, expended thousands of dollars and now in despair at the treatment accorded them by the Interior Department they are abandoning their entries. That policy is not conservation, it is destruction. The Government would have benefited, the local community would have been benefited, and the Nation would have profited if these women had obtained title to their homesteads. If gold is discovered, or silver or lead or coal, it benefits the local communities and adds to the general wealth of all of the people of our land. What we need in this country is greater production, greater production of agricultural products, increased production of coal and lead and copper and all other minerals.

I have upon several occasions denounced the autocracy of some of the executive departments and agencies of the Government. The executive agencies of some monarchial governments have exercised less power and authority than executive officials have exercised in this Republic. I am somewhat familiar with the administration of the laws in other countries. I believe that we have a more tyrannous bureaucracy in some departments and bureaus of our Government than can be found in some of the nations of the Old World. The West has been the victim of a deadly paternalism and a most oppressive bureaucracy.

Several years ago, when I was in the House, I offered a bill to cede to the States the public lands therein. There was a very strong sentiment among the leaders of both political parties, not only in the House but in the Senate, in favor of a cession to the States of all public lands found therein. The original thirteen States owned all the lands within their borders. Texas was not under the authority of the Federal Government with respect to the lands within her borders. There is no question but what the States owning the public lands within their limits disposed of them to a better advantage than the Federal Government through its officials has been able to dispose of lands owned by it. It has been some time since I examined the figures, but my recollection is that the Interior Department is costing the Government more now than at any time in the history of the past, although the public lands are diminishing in quantity the cost of administration is mounting year by year. If this bill now before us is passed it will call for hundreds if not thousands of more employees. A friend of mine called this bill a measure to "keep jobs for persons now in the Government service, and to furnish thousands of jobs for hungry office seekers." There is no question but what its administration will be exceedingly costly to the Federal Government, and I have no hesitancy in saying that the returns will not be commensurate with its expenditures. The leasing system is not a democratic system; it is not in harmony with democratic institutions. It is a relic of mediævalism. Spain imposed the leasing system upon the Western Hemisphere.

The King and the nobles of Spain thought that it would enrich the Crown and bring a golden stream into the treasury of the Spanish Kingdom; but they were disillusioned. The costs of administration were greater than the revenues. Moreover, the application of the leasing system retarded development, led to frauds and various evils, and, of course, superimposed upon the people an oppressive and tyrannous system. It is hateful to think of a Republic being a landlord. Rules and regulations relating to the use and occupancy of property promulgated by executive officials and enforced by an army of Federal employees will cause resentment and prove harmful to the people of the United States.

President Polk combated the leasing system and struck it down after it had been enforced for nearly 40 years. Benton and other great statesmen denounced it as vicious, as un-American, and as a reactionary contribution from the discredited nations of the Old World.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator ought to say, however, that it was not abolished until it had proven itself an absolute failure.

Mr. KING. What my colleague says, Mr. President, is true. The leasing system was a failure. Mr. Polk's message to Congress recited the fact that it had proven a great loss in administration; that it had not only been an irritant and had prevented the development of lead and the other mineral properties of the Government but that it had proven an expense to the Federal Government.

In the Sixty-fifth session of Congress I offered a bill which called for a cession of the public lands to the States. I offered the same bill at the beginning of this session. I purpose offering it as a substitute for the pending measure. I shall at this time content myself with the request that it be printed and laid upon the table to be brought to the attention of the Senate when we shall further consider the bill now before us.

I know, Mr. President, that most of the Senators from the West are opposed to this leasing bill. No doubt most of them, however, will support it. They will support it for the same reasons stated by the Senator from Colorado; not because they approve of its provisions but because the West is in the grasp of forces which are preventing its development and are therefore injuring the entire country. Rather than continue the present policy, which is so iniquitous and so intolerable, I presume a majority of the Senators from the West will reluctantly give their assent to this measure.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I expect on Monday to have the pending bill taken up at once and to keep it before the Senate until it is passed. No Senator desires to proceed this afternoon with the consideration of the bill, and it being late on Saturday afternoon, I think, perhaps, it would be better not to insist upon going on with it. I therefore move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock next Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, August 25, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.
